Before any course of action could be decided upon, both horse and rider vanished from the view of those assembled at the inn-door by passing round a bend in the road about a hundred yards or so in advance.

The horse which Tom had so unexpectedly acquired was certainly no beauty as far as appearance was concerned. He was by far too wiry and bony.

But he possessed the virtue of being able to get over the ground in an amazing style; in fact, our old friend at first could scarcely believe that the animal had such powers of speed.

He was soon convinced of it, however, beyond all possibility of doubt, and he discovered likewise another recommendation—namely, that the horse possessed remarkable powers of endurance.

Under all these circumstances, Tom had good cause to congratulate himself.

"Serves him right!" he muttered to himself, as he thought of the traveller's disappointment. "He will doubtless think of me the next time he attempts to overreach anybody. The idea, now, of a hundred guineas for a screw like this! As to the people at the inn, I will call and make it right with them some day."

Other thoughts, however, of a more serious and important nature quickly drove all these considerations from his mind.

His stay at the inn had consumed much more time than he was aware of, and he was really doubtful whether he should be able to reach his destination before daylight.

This, of course, he was most anxious to accomplish, for he knew how intense would be the anxiety suffered by his comrades. Besides, he was also forcibly reminded that he stood greatly in need of rest.

These reflections induced him to urge his steed to yet more rapid motion.

The trees and hedgerows seemed to flit by him like shadows.

Suddenly there came upon his ears a loud shrill cry, and at the same instant a dark figure started up in his path.

Who or what it was he could not immediately ascertain, for either the cry or the sudden appearance of a dark object in its path, or both, terrified his horse exceedingly.

The animal gave such a bound that Tom was bumped violently upon the pommel of the saddle, and but for his long practice in the art of riding he would have been hurled to the earth.

As it was he was fortunate enough to retain his balance, but ere he could properly regain his seat his ears were assailed by the shrill tones of a voice which surely must have belonged to a female.

"Ha, ha! it is a brave deed, is it not, to injure and insult those who are aged and too weak to offer any resistance to oppression? A brave deed in good truth, but for once you are deceived! I possess both the power and the will to work harm to you and yours! Ay, and I will do it, and that at once! No—no, I will not suffer this! Have I, then, lived to be ridden down on the highway, and by the likes of you? No, no—a thousand—ten thousand times no!"

These words were poured out with a volubility of utterance truly surprising.

They were pronounced, too, with great emphasis and bitterness of tone.

Tom listened in amazement.

What he had done to call down all this anger upon his head he could not tell.

Straining his eyes in the darkness, he indistinctly and gloomily made out the figure of an aged woman, whose gaunt thin frame was enveloped in an old and tattered cloak.

From what she said it would seem that Tom had been near to riding her down; and what was more, she seemed impressed with the idea that it had been done purposely.

Such, however, was far from being the case, such an act being entirely opposed to Tom King's nature.

"My good woman——" he began.

"Good woman forsooth!" she shrieked, with more bitterness and discordance than ever. "Do not good woman me! I tell you that you shall rue this deed, and let it stand as a warning to others who would act as you have done!"

"Listen to me!" cried Tom, seizing upon the first opportunity of saying a word that had presented itself. "I assure you——"

"Ha, ha! It is vastly fine thus to attempt to palliate what you have done! But the excuse shall not avail you—not in the least!"

"Then, since you will not listen to reason, I will ride on," exclaimed Tom, who now concluded that he had some madwoman to deal with, and that it would be consequently useless to expostulate.

But the woman would not allow him thus to make his escape.

With a sudden spring she placed herself directly in his path, extending her arms like those of a phantom, and waving them furiously the while.

Tom's horse had not yet recovered from his first terror, and now it reared and swaggered, resolutely refusing to pass the strange-looking object.

In vain Tom gored his horse with the spurs.

The animal only became more and more unmanageable, and, if possible, more determined not to advance.

"Ha, ha!" screamed the hag. "Why not make your steed ride over me now? You cannot do it! I defy you to do it! He will fling you to the earth first! My eye is fixed upon him, and he cannot disregard my gaze. No, no—you shall remain there until I make you acquainted with your doom—that doom which, though you know it not, is fast approaching!"

In spite of himself, Tom could not help being sensible of an indefinable sensation of dread which crept over him.

"It moves you, then?" she shrieked, in continuation, and her eyes must have been keen indeed to have detected any alteration in Tom's manner. "That is because every word I utter finds an echo in your heart! What I speak is the truth! There shall come woe upon you and yours—evil for them is gathering like a cloud, and soon—very soon it will encompass them so that there will be no hope of escape!"

"I have no desire to listen to your idle words!" cried Tom, vehemently, and once more striving to urge his horse into motion.

"Idle do you call them? You will soon have cause to think of them differently. Your own end draws nigh! You are young—you are full of life and strength! But for all that you shall die: not under the hangman—your neck has once already been encircled by the gibbet's rope, and you deserve to end your days at Tyburn! But such shall not be your fate—such shall not be your fate!"

"Begone!" said Tom King, who was scarcely able to pronounce the word, so much was he overcome by these last startling words.

Well calculated, indeed, were they to produce a profound impression upon him.

By what mysterious means short of the supernatural could this woman—whose features he had not even seen—have become acquainted with this dark episode of his life? That she was acquainted with it was certain, though Tom could scarcely at the moment bring himself to credit it or believe that his ears had served him rightly.

"You are surprised," continued this strange being. "Accept that as a proof and token of my power, and let it cause you to place reliance upon what I predict shall happen in the future. I tell you that your fate lies open and plain before me, and as easy to read as it would be if written in a book. You cannot avert your doom—you cannot escape it."

"Then let me know the worst at once," said Tom King, with sudden boldness. "I am tired of these indirect allusions. What have you to prognosticate? Tell me, and allow me to depart!"

"You are bold now—but what I have to tell will blanch your cheek and abate your haughtiness of tone."

"You are wrong—quite wrong! Tyburn Tree is all that I fear, and you have just told me that I shall not die there."

"Nor shall you—a worse fate awaits you!"

Tom laughed derisively.

"Nay, scoff not! You have a friend."

"More than one, I trust."

"Ay, now you have, but they will pass away ere long, and one only shall be left. That one is your stanchest, truest, oldest, and best friend—at his hands shall you meet your death!"

Tom laughed more scornfully than ever.

"Ay—ay, you may jeer and deride me; but wait—wait you will find then that my prophecy is true."

"I laugh at it," said Tom, "and shall always do so. I hope I may live until my best friend takes my life."

"Vain, foolish wish! I tell you even your very days are numbered; and I repeat that you will die by the hand of your best friend. You need fear no other danger. You can court death in whatever shape you like, and it will not come to you—but from your friend you cannot escape."

"And I repeat that I hope I may live till then. And as for your prophecy, I say once more that I utterly despise it. Now let me pass."

"You say those words with your lips only, and you know full well that there is within your breast a still small voice against whose tones you cannot close your inward ears. I tell you, you are doomed! Forget my words if you can! Now pass on!"

With these words this mysterious person vanished as suddenly and as strangely as she had appeared, leaving Tom equally in the dark as to whence she had come and whither she had gone.

The highwayman's first impulse was to strike his spurs deeply into his horse's flanks, but in good truth the animal now needed little urging forward.

The sole obstacle to its onward progress was now removed, and it relieved itself of its terror by galloping from the spot at its utmost rate of speed.

So strange and rapid had the whole of this adventure been, that Tom could hardly bring himself to believe that it was a reality.

He fancied that his mind had played him some strange prank—that he had been the victim of some singular delusion or waking dream.

As he reflected, however, he soon came to the conclusion that the encounter had indeed taken place; and although he strove his best to do so, yet he was unable to banish from his mind the remembrance of the singular prediction.

"I will not waste another thought upon it," he muttered for the fiftieth time, as his horse continued its mad, headlong career through the darkness. "And yet how strange! What if, after all, it should come true? Die by the hand of my best friend! Why, that can be no other than —— No—no, I can never credit it—it is too monstrous for belief!"

But in spite of such words as these, his thoughts would persist in recurring to this circumstance.

"Evil befall us all," was his next mental ejaculation. "Well, I will think about that; it will go hard with me if I don't baffle her. I will persuade Dick and the rest to leave England with Tom Davis—whether we ever return again is another consideration. Yes—yes, that is what I will do. We will secure our safety while we have the chance."

The reader will not fail to notice the singular coincidence between the thoughts of Tom King and of Maud and Dick.

Was this to be taken as an omen of good or evil?

Time will show.

Upon Tom King's mind, however, remained a most disagreeable conviction—one which he tried hard to conceal even from himself, but, of course, without success. It was that the bond of fellowship which had so long existed was about to be broken up—that their long career of daring and perilous adventure was drawing to a close.

It is not surprising that his singular adventure should have left such an impression upon his mind, especially when we bear in mind the incidents which had latterly befallen him, the nature of which would be all sufficient to dim and overcome the most powerful intellect.

His preoccupation prevented him from making use of that amount of caution which is requisite to safe progress; and all at once his horse gave a sudden plunge, and before Tom knew what had happened, he found himself lying at full length in the roadway.

He had been sitting carelessly in the saddle, and the unexpected movement upon his steed's part had been sufficient to unhorse him.

Muttering some angry execrations, Tom scrambled to his feet.

The horse, having performed this feat, stood perfectly still, with its eyes fixed upon, and its ears pointed towards, the object which had terrified him.

Cursing the unruly beast, Tom walked gently towards him, and was fortunate enough to grasp the rein just at the moment when he was about to gallop off.

By this time the intense darkness which had hitherto prevailed was beginning to dissipate.

There was a chill gray light about the eastern portion of the sky which gave to every object a spectral-like, unnatural appearance.

A thin white mist also hovered over the surface of the earth.

Tom shivered as he rapidly brushed the dirt from his apparel.

Beyond a good shaking and a few bruises, he had not sustained any injury from his fall.

"Curse you!" he ejaculated, bestowing a sharp blow upon the brute. "What had you to be frightened at, I wonder? Ha, I see now!"

As he uttered these words, Tom became silent, and gazed with an intensity only equalled by that of his steed upon the object before him

It was a double gibbet, from whose time-blackened arms two mouldering corpses were depending, looking, in that dim light, and viewed through the floating mist, ten thousand times more horrible than they could have done under any other circumstances.

A chill, damp breeze was blowing, which in itself was most depressive to the mind.

It lifted the hair from Tom's face, ruffled the mane upon his horse's neck, and whistled with a wailful, melancholy sound through the mass of ironwork in which the bodies of the malefactors were enclosed.

CHAPTER MLIII.

IN WHICH THE HIGHWAYMEN ARE DISAGREEABLY INTERRUPTED.

"I do not wonder at your terror," Tom at length ejaculated, apostrophising his steed, and turning shudderingly away. "In good truth, it is a most loathsome spectacle."

The highwayman spoke truly.

It would have been hard to find anything else so soul-chilling.

It would, too, be impossible to conceive anything more desolate and forlorn than his surroundings.

The double gibbet was situated at one corner of a large piece of waste ground or common, over the vast level surface of which the mist rolled like an ocean of vapour.

A moment or two elapsed before Tom could summon up strength of mind sufficient to avert his eyes from the dreary scene.

Dismal, unutterable thoughts thronged unbidden into his mind.

The recollection, however, that he had some miles to go before he reached his destination had the effect of arousing him.

He turned round quickly.

The old hag's prophecy was near proving a false one, I fancy!" he murmured, as he settled himself in the saddle, thinking the while of the narrow escape which he had had from receiving a fatal injury by his fall.

The next moment he was galloping swiftly on his way, for his horse, having perhaps discovered that the gibbet was an immovable object, no longer hesitated to pass it.

Without any further accident or mischance, Tom succeeded in reaching the Jolly Tar.

His approach had been descried from afar, and his appearance had been heartily hailed by his comrades on the watch.

"You have kept us in a state of great suspense, Tom," were Dick Turpin's first words. "I do believe this night is one of the longest I ever spent. But what a terror you are in! What has happened?"

"You shall know all presently."

"You seem faint and languid."

"I am—I am! But you shall know all."

"Enter, then—enter! Tom Davis shall see to your horse—I see it is a fresh one."

"Yes—yes!"

"We had made up our minds to wait no longer than midnight for you; but when the hour arrived without your making your appearance, we resolved to give you a few moments more, and so we have remained procrastinating our intent until the present moment."

The conversation was changed as they made their way into the interior of the building.

A glass of brandy brought from the cellar served to revive Tom considerably; and having swallowed it, he proceeded to make his friends acquainted with what had befallen him.

The account of his capture was listened to with the most absorbing interest, and although he was congratulated on the skill and address which he had shown in procuring his liberation, yet all expressed it as their opinion that this disappointment would have the effect of rendering his foes more furious than ever, if indeed it was possible for this to be the case.

For some reason, but what it would have puzzled him to tell, Tom King withheld all mention of his singular meeting with the hag, so that his comrades remained in entire ignorance of the strange prediction.

Tom would have liked very much to persuade himself that he adopted this course of action because he placed no importance on the incident, but had he been pressed closely he could not have made this avowal truthfully.

His narration having been brought to a conclusion, he withdrew to obtain that rest of which he stood so much in need, having first made an arrangement that the succeeding night should be devoted to a consultation.

To Tom himself the intervening hours passed rapidly enough, for he did not awake until just as the shades of evening were closing in, the task of keeping watch being taken upon by his companions.

It was just when evening was changing into night that they all assembled themselves before a fire in the apartment they had hitherto occupied, and which the ruddy light from the fire caused to have far from an uncomfortable appearance.

When we say all, we except Tom Davis.

It was thought he could best be spared from the discussion which was about to take place, and so he was set to watch in the upper chamber, though the length of time which they had remained unmolested began to have its usual effects—namely, to beget a feeling of false security.

They all looked to Dick to speak first, but on this occasion he would have preferred to hear the opinions of his comrades first.

But they would not for a moment listen to this arrangement.

"Well, then," said Dick, with a smile, and glancing at Maud while he spoke, "I fancy what I have to say will take you all by surprise; but yet I hope, for all that, that you will give the subject due consideration."

"We are sure to do that, Dick," said Claude Duval, "because we know you would not broach the matter unless you had considered it well beforehand."

"Well, then, it is that we should all, for a time at least, quit the shores of England in company with Tom Davis."

"Quit England!" cried the rest in chorus: Tom King because he was amazed at hearing that which he intended to propose himself, and Claude and Jack because such a course of action had never once entered into their imaginations.

"You are astonished," Turpin continued, "which is just what I expected. But the first shock of your amazement being over, I think several things will present themselves to you that will induce you to think favourably upon the subject."

"It is most extraordinary," responded Tom, "for I myself intended to propose the self-same thing."

"Is it possible?"

"It is more, for it is true; and I fancy Claude and Jack will not be long in seeing the policy of this course of action."

"But," asked Jack, "is it your intention to quit England for ever?"

"That had better be reserved for future consideration."

"Because," continued Jack, "if that had been your thought, I should have returned a negative at once."

"There is ample time to decide that. The question now is, whether we shall leave Stonehenge for the coast, and, taking a boat there, all make our way to France, and remain there until the popular excitement has calmed down a little?"

There was a pause.

Maud waited with bated breath for the result.

Although Dick had spoken only of a temporary exile, she hoped that when she had once got him away from England her influence would be sufficient to prevent him from returning.

"Do you see any objections to the course proposed?" Dick asked, at length, upon finding that the silence remained unbroken. "If so, do not hesitate to speak out. I am only anxious to obtain your opinions."

"As I said," replied Tom King, "I am quite in favour of it."

"And I see no objection," added Claude Duval.

"Nor I," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Then we may look upon the affair as settled?"

"I suppose so."

"The next thing is as to the funds in hand. I have formed what I believe to be a tolerably correct estimate, and I think there will be no need to engage in any more adventures just at present. When we leave here for Stonehenge, which must be shortly—as it is impossible to say how long we may be detained upon the road—we will separate, and each follow our own inclinations."

Scarcely had these words been pronounced than a hasty footstep was heard without.

The next moment Tom Davis made his appearance upon the threshold.

There was an expression upon his face which spoke plainly enough, without the aid of words, telling his friends that something was amiss.

"What is it?" Dick asked, springing to his feet

"Officers, captain!"

"Officers?" repeated the rest, following Dick's example.

"Yes."

"Where?"

"Outside. I saw them from the look-out. You had better come and see for yourselves."

"But did they seem as though they had tracked us here?"

"I cannot answer that question, captain. I did not stay long enough to notice. Be quick! You ought to reconnoitre carefully."

In this all agreed, and there was an immediate stir.

"Do not be so much terrified, Maud," said Dick, observing that she clung very tightly to him, and that even her lips were white. "The danger is not so great as you seem to think it—indeed it is not! Perhaps these officers may know nothing of our being here, their presence being merely accidental; and if so, they will ride by, leaving us in peace, for there is nothing in the exterior of this place of such a character as to create suspicion."

These words calmed Maud somewhat, and her heart fluttered rather less painfully than it had done a few moments before.

"I don't know how it is, Dick, and you will laugh at me, I daresay, for having what you will of course call a foolish notion."

"What is it, Maud?"

"Why, this sudden and unexpected realisation of my wishes does not seem to fill me with that joy which I expected. On the contrary, I feel a strange and altogether indescribable calmness, and—and——"

"And what?"

"Over all is a presentiment that something will occur that will prevent the carrying out of our arrangements."

This little conversation passed during the ascent of the stairs; but by the time the last words were uttered the look-out was gained, and so Dick was prevented from returning any reply to Maud's last remark.

Not that Dick altogether regretted this, for there was an aching pain in his breast which seemed sympathetic with Maud's feelings which would have rendered a cheering response difficult, if not impossible.

The various points of espionage were now immediately occupied, and a quick search made for the police officers.

The night was rather dark, but yet the obscurity was not so great as to prevent them, from that elevation, obtaining a tolerably good view of contiguous objects.

"That's the place, captain," said Tom Davis, in a faint whisper—"that's where I saw them! Are they there now?"

Dick looked closely, and at the first glance saw that Tom Davis had not given a useless or unnecessary alarm.

Coming slowly along the lane was a body of police officers.

All were mounted, and as they rode the clanking of accoutrements could be occasionally heard, showing that they were fully armed.

They were making their way steadily along the lane in the direction of the inn, from which, when Dick first caught sight of them, they were not much above ten yards distant.

"Close quarters!" whispered Claude Duval, at this moment, looking over Dick's shoulder.

"Much too close to be pleasant."

"What are they after?"

"That is what puzzles me."

"Are they coming here?"

"I fear so. What else but the intention of paying a visit to this place can have induced them to make their way into this desolate, deserted region?"

"We had better be off, then."

"Wait a moment. We had better not be too precipitate. We cannot leave even now without discovering ourselves."

"Very true."

"Then, as I need scarcely tell you, there is just the bare possibility that their errand may not concern this place in the least degree, and we may have the satisfaction of seeing them ride by."

"We may, but I doubt it."

"We shall see."

"Certainly we shall. But just look at that fellow there—I mean the one with the staff yonder."

"Yes, yes—I see him."

"He is most certainly pointing to the place, and he and his companions are as certainly talking about it."

"Nothing more likely; but still, at the same time, their conversation may only refer to the deeds which they have heard of as having been enacted here."

"It may be so, possibly."

"At any rate, we can only remain here as we are, and await the event."

"Just so."

This whispered conversation had been listened to by the other members of the little group.

But we cannot stay now to particularise them.

The next few moments were moments of the most intense anxiety to our friends, though none would have thought so from the profound silence which prevailed.

On came the officers at the same slow and steady pace.

They were talking to each other, for the murmur of conversation ascended to the ears of the listeners, but it was indistinctly, nor, in spite of all their efforts, were they able to make out one articulate word.

The suspense grew greater and greater.

In the course of another moment the officers reached the front of the inn, and no sooner had they reached this position than, owing to the slope of the roof, our friends were unable any longer to observe their movements.

But they could listen.

The tread of the horses' feet was still audible.

Suddenly a loud voice pronounced the word:

"Halt!"

In an instant ensued considerable confusion, but it quickly died away, as one after another the officers succeeded in bringing their animals to a standstill.

"Dick," whispered Claude, "we have waited too long."

"Not at all," was the reply; "it would have been little short of madness to have left earlier."

"What is to be done?"

"There is yet time, if we only retain our calmness and make use of proper expedition."

"Issue your instructions, then."

"The officers have taken no measures at present to surround the place, so that I have no doubt we shall get off all right. Descend the stairs speedily and silently. The sooner we get to the stable and have the horses in readiness for travelling the better."

No sooner were these words pronounced than they set about obeying them.

Dick looked to his weapons.

Maud watched him closely.

"The danger is great," she said—"very great!"

"No—no, not at all. I believe we shall get off without the officers being any the wiser until they are too late to act."

"Then you think they are not aware of our presence here?"

"I am certain of it, or they would have made widely different arrangements."

"Just at this moment they reached the foot of the staircase, which happened to be at no very great distance from the front-door.

Here they paused a moment as though by common consent.

"D—n the lock!" said a voice. "What the devil ails it?"

"What's the matter, sir?"

"Matter? Why, the key won't turn a bit. Here, you try!"

The rattling of the key in the lock now followed, and an effort was made to open the door.

"Are you sure it was not fastened on the inside?"

"Fastened on the inside, you booby? Don't I tell you this is the way we came out, and Bob Paterson locked it and gave me the key!"

"Then Bob ought to be here to unlock it, for I'll be d—d if I can! I tell you I am sure it is fastened on the inside."

Dick and his friends did not wait to hear any more, though it was evident that a very angry discussion ensued, for the police officer in command was one who could not brook the least contradiction.

What they heard impressed our friends with the hope that they should yet have time to get away before their foes were aware of their presence.

All regretted, though, that they should be compelled to quit their present quarters so soon, for now there would be no returning to them, as immediately upon the officers forcing an entrance they would find traces of the house having been inhabited, even if they did not hear them in the act of effecting their retreat, which was a very likely thing indeed.

The back part of the inn was reached in silence and with great rapidity.

One after another they passed with all possible speed through the window, and then flitted across to the stables.

There were many nimble hands at work, and the horses were quickly provided with their trappings.

Maud was left just outside the stable-door, in order to give timely warning should any of their foes approach.

"Quick!" she murmured. "I fancy I can hear them coming round this way."

"One more moment, and we shall be ready."

"The attack on the front door has ceased. Yes, yes, they are coming round to the back—they are here!"

As she spoke the words, Maud entered the stable hastily and closed the door, for had she retained her former station the officers must have seen her.

"How cursedly awkward!" growled Claude Duval, under his voice. "Another half-minute, and we could have been in the saddle and off."

"Hush, hush!" said Dick. "Let us watch them; perhaps there is no immediate cause for alarm."

This was a strange speech, but Dick's companions understood it.

Once more, then, were the whole of their energies concentrated upon the task of watching closely every movement made by the officers.

The one in command must have come to the conclusion that the front door had been fastened in some mysterious way or other, and seemed to have made his way round to the back, as though aware it would be easier to gain admittance from that quarter.

They all went direct to the back door, which, as our friends knew, was well fastened—so well, that our friends had preferred making their way in and out of the window to unfastening it.

"This is as fast as the other, sir."

"I thought so—we took every pains to make it secure."

"Then who could have fastened the front door?"

"Never mind bothering your stupid head about that! We will break this door down—it don't seem so strong as the other. I am determined to get in somehow!"

"We want something heavier than we carry to do this job, sir. What can we have?"

"Look about—you will be sure to see something."

"Shall I look in the stable yonder?"

"Yes, d—n you!—wherever you like! And as for the rest, let them commence the job with their pickaxes, and then we shall have the door down before you come back!"

Notwithstanding the taunting, sneering manner of his chief, this obtuse, wrong-headed police officer made his way direct to the door of the stable.

The question now was, what should our friends do? They felt very undecided.

To prevent the approach of this man was impossible, while, if he entered, discovery must ensue.

"What is to be done, Dick?" asked Tom King.

"Let him come in. Keep out of the way, all of you, and as soon as he is fairly inside, seize him and prevent him from crying out."

"But what good will that effect?"

"Hush—hush! Obey—there is no time to discuss the point now."

The police officer was indeed almost on the threshold.

No resource was left for our friends save to obey their captain's commands, and they immediately resolved to do so, trusting entirely to his sagacity.

The officer, upon reaching the stable door, gave it a push with his hand, and finding it yield, he at once advanced.

"It's d—d dark!" he said. "How the devil shall I find anything in here, I wonder? Hullo——"

That was the last word he had an opportunity of uttering, and it was spoken above a whisper, and that was all.

To his unutterable surprise, he felt himself seized tightly by two persons, while a third dashed his hand roughly before his mouth, and so effectually as completely to preclude the possibility of further speech.

"Secure him," said Dick, in a whisper; "and be as speedy about it as you can. In the meantime, I will keep a sharp look-out."

Upon looking through the doorway again, Dick saw that the officers were very busy with their cutlasses, and yet without producing any particular result.

The fact was the weapons were too light and by no means well adapted to the job; besides which, the door was composed of some unusually tough oak.

"We want something heavier, sir," said the police officers, desisting at length. "A sledge, now, would be the very thing."

"A what?"

"A sledge hammer."

"To be sure it is! But where is Partridge?"

Partridge was the name of the officer who had been so cleverly and silently secured by Dick's associates.

A general look was turned in the direction of the stabling.

"What can he be after? Has the rascal gone to sleep? Hi! Partridge—Partridge! Why the devil don't you answer?"

Partridge had a very good reason for not answering, had his commander but been aware of it.

While this little dialogue had taken place our friends had with nimble fingers strongly secured him by means of a rope, with which as well they contrived to gag him very effectually.

Moreover, Tom Davis stood over him with a loaded pistol.

"It's d—d odd," said the chief officer, "that he don't answer—d—d odd indeed! Partridge, I say!"

But, as before, no response was returned.

Up to this moment the existence of the little window which had served the highwaymen as a means of entrance and exit had escaped the notice of the officers.

Now one saw it, and hailed the discovery with a shout.

"Why," he said, "if we had but have seen this before we might have made our way in a dozen times over. Why, behold! the window is open!"

"That's d—d odd too!" remarked the chief officer. "But where's Partridge?—that's what I want to know!"

CHAPTER MLIV.

THE HIGHWAYMEN TAKE THEIR LAST LOOK OF THE JOLLY TAR INN.

THE last words were uttered in a tone of suspicion and distrust, showing that at last the chief police officer had become conscious that there was something wrong.

What this was he had not sense enough to surmise, but he felt that he was upon the brink of some astounding discovery.

"Partridge!" he bawled, for the third time.

But, as before, Partridge replied not.

Meanwhile, our friends in the stable were not idle.

Dick had concerted his plan of operations, and he now proceeded to have them carried into execution.

Having seen Partridge disposed of according to his instructions, he said:

"Now mount, all of you; and at the word of command be prepared to follow one another out as fast as possible. The officers will be so taken by surprise that they will be a moment or so before they recover themselves."

"Right, captain!" was the answer.

It was a desperate chance.

But yet Dick's comrades could see that it was their only one.

Accordingly they set about making their preparations with great alacrity.

The reader will scarcely require to be told that it did not take them many seconds to place themselves securely in their saddles.

As before, Maud shared Black Boss with Dick Turpin. She was terrified, but calm.

"When we ride out," whispered Turpin, as he drew her closely towards him, "be sure you bend your head as low down as you can, so as to avoid all contact with the top of the door. It is very low—you cannot stoop too much."

"I will be careful," she replied. "Do not trouble yourself to look after me, Dick—mind your own safety, and I will take care of myself."

"We are all ready, captain," whispered Tom King, at this juncture.

"Is Tom Davis mounted?"

"Yes."

"Then prepare! Ha! I fear, after all, we are too late! Quick—quick! Follow me! Charge—charge!"

These ejaculations were caused by the proceedings of the officers.

By this time they began to guess what had caused the detention of Partridge.

One happened, too, to hear the click of a horse's shoe against the rough bricks with which the stable was paved.

"There's some one in the stable, sir!" cried one of the officers—"I am sure of it!"

"Seize them, then! Forward—forward!"

But just at that precise instant of time, Black Bess dashed through the doorway of the stable with the swiftness of an arrow.

The officers were so taken by surprise by this sudden movement, that they drew back in order to escape from injury, and then remained just as they were, as though completely dumfoundered.

"Good evening!" cried Dick, reining Bess up with such suddenness that she rose on her hind legs and pawed the air with her fore feet. "You seem taken by surprise by this sudden meeting. Here's wishing you success! Good-night, gentlemen. If you are inclined for a gallop across the country, say the word—I would not baulk your inclinations for the world!"

With these words on his lips, Dick turned and galloped off, and he had actually got several yards before one of the officers sufficiently recovered the use of his senses to fire a pistol.

"Dick Turpin, by all that's d—nable!" roared the chief officer. "Who ever would have dreamed that he was here—and all his gang, too? Fire—fire, my lads!—fire steady! Remember, the reward is just the same dead or alive!"

A straggling, dropping volley followed these words; but by this time all our friends had managed to get out of the range of the short, stumpy pistols that the officers at that time were so fond of using, and which were only effective in very close quarters.

"Oh, Dick," said Maud, "why did you terrify me by pulling up in front of them as you did? Surely that was an act of needless daring—I might call it mere bravado!"

"But we are safe."

"That does not make any difference."

"I think it does. Besides, I had a deeper motive than any which seems to have occurred to you."

"What was it?"

"Why, did you not see that I diverted the attention of the officers, and so was the means of enabling the others to make their way out of the stable in safety?"

"True; but it was at the hazard of your own life."

"I thought the risk not too great to be run; and you see the event has proved that I was quite right. Do they mean trying a gallop? Well, let them come on—I am ready for them."

Dick was quite right in what he said about diverting the attention of the officers.

It was in the highest degree generous of him to run the risk for his friends, but then it was no more than the reader would expect from him under such circumstances.

The plan answered admirably.

[DICK TURPIN AND MAUD FIND A PLACE OF REFUGE.]

The police officers had eyes and ears for nothing else but him, so that his companions were enabled to quit the stable without any molestation whatever; and, as we have said, when the officers did make a demonstration against them, it was too late to be of any service.

But, furious with anger to think they had so grossly blundered about their work, and oursing their stupidity a thousand times over for not having thought before about what was the real state of the case, the officers rushed round to the spot where they had left their horses, and began to scramble into their saddles like so many demons.

But expeditious as they were in their movements, our friends were enabled to get an excellent start.

Away they swept over the meadows in a straggling, irregular line, intent upon making as much speed as they could, being well aware of the importance of doing so.

No. 227.—Black Bess.

They did not pull in in the least until compelled to do so by coming to a piece of rising ground, up which they allowed their horses to proceed at a walk.

They were now able to get closer together than they had been hitherto, and also had the opportunity of exchanging a few words with each other.

Sixteen-String Jack was the first to speak.

Great exultation was in his tones.

"I must say," he cried, "that that was about as neatly managed as a thing well could be! Dick, that was a bit of your old spirit, and I was glad to see it, for I judged from the remarks you dropped to-night, that you were beginning to grow tired of the road."

Of the last part of this speech Dick Turpin did not think fit to take any notice, so he merely said:

"Of course you are all unhurt?"

"Yes, thanks to you!"

"It was splendidly managed, Dick," said Tom King, in a voice of enthusiasm. "Nothing could be better."

Dick acknowledged the compliment with so profound a bow that a general laugh was elicited.

"They are coming," he remarked, after having cast a glance behind him "They mean to give us all the trouble they can."

"They must be mad to think of chasing us."

"Yet they think of doing it. They are much exasperated, no doubt, and perhaps they flatter themselves that they will be able to hang upon our heels until they meet with assistance of some kind or other."

"Perhaps they do, but this hill will check their ardour."

"I fancy so."

"But we are nearly at the top. Had we not better arrange what we shall do?"

"What do you propose, captain?"

"Why, I think we cannot do better than take the present opportunity of carrying into effect that which we had just agreed upon."

"A separation?"

"Yes. Are you all agreed?"

There was a little discussion upon this question, but eventually an answer in the affirmative was given.

"Then let us part upon reaching the summit of this hill."

"And our meeting-place?"

"Stonehenge."

"About a month hence?"

"Yes, rather less than that time."

"And how shall we separate, captain?"

"That I will leave you to settle among yourselves. Remember to be punctual, and Tom King, my friend."

"Yes, Dick?"

"Don't forget to bring with you that nice little treasure which you buried. It will be most useful."

"I will not, you may depend."

"And remember," said Dick Turpin, "these last words: In all the adventures which you have between this time and that appointed for our meeting you have to keep in view one thing, and that is to make as much booty as you are able, for, rely upon it, we shall have good need of it."

"You may depend upon us, captain."

"Then now farewell! Disperse, and that will add not a little to the confusion of our foes. They will not know how to divide themselves so as to continue the pursuit with any prospect of success. Above all, be careful not to run into too much danger, because it will be difficult to afford assistance."

"Right, captain."

"Once more, then, farewell! It will be madness to linger longer."

"Farewell!"

"You, Tom Davis, follow me," cried Dick.

Not another word was spoken.

The brow of the hill had been reached a moment or so ago, and the officers, perceiving that the objects of their pursuit made a stand, pushed on with additional vigour, in the hope of turning the circumstance to their own advantage.

No words of ours, however, can express the dismay and consternation which they experienced upon seeing the whole of the party suddenly break up and ride off in different directions.

What to do now they knew not, so they found themselves under the necessity of coming to a halt and holding a consultation.

It was at length decided what they should do.

"Let us follow Dick Turpin. His capture is worth the most money, and we are more likely to succeed if we do this than if we weaken ourselves by a division."

This proposition had everything to recommend it, so it is not surprising that it should be unanimously agreed to.

Not one relished the idea of separation, for they fully realised the strength which attended their union.

Perhaps, as some one was to be pursued, they could not have made a better choice for the highwaymen than Dick Turpin himself.

He smiled when he turned and saw what tactics they had resolved to adopt.

"Let them come," he said, "and I will undertake to give them a tiring. Get ahead, Tom Davis, and let me see what speed that horse of yours is capable of making when hard pressed. Never fear but that Black Bess will keep up with you."

Tom Davis well understood what was required of him, and caused his steed to lay out in excellent style.

Despite her double burden, though, Black Bess kept just a pace or two in the rear, contriving to do so without manifesting the least exertion.

The officers, seeing that so good a start was made by the fugitives, grew more furious than ever, and spurred their horses so savagely that their track might have been followed by the drops of blood which dripped from the poor animals' panting flanks.

This barbarity, however, did not enable them to accomplish their wishes.

Although the spur was seconded with sharp lashes from the heavy riding whips they carried, they had the mortification of finding that the objects of their pursuit kept increasing the space there already was between them.

Maud glanced continually over Dick's shoulder.

At first she did so with uncontrollable trepidation; but when she saw that after all their exertions the officers kept dropping further and further into the rear her courage revived.

As for Dick himself, he was well aware that Black Bess could not sustain her double burden with impunity.

The strain must of necessity be greater, and the shorter its duration of course the better.

It was this which made Dick determine to put a period to the chase as speedily as possible, and long experience had taught him that the most effectual and speedy way to do this was to continue their rapid flight unhaltingly, so that the officers, finding their prey out of sight, should the sooner abandon the chase.

Not a very long time elapsed before the consummation of one of his purposes, for owing to the obscurity of the night he soon got quite out of view.

But the officers were able to follow the sound made by the horses' feet.

With a view of baffling them in this respect, also, Dick chose some soft marshy ground which, though rather heavy for travelling, yet, nevertheless, served to dull the sound raised by the concussion of the hoofs.

Not for long, however, did he continue thus.

As soon as ever he deemed it expedient, he directed Tom Davis to make his way to a large tract of woodland, which could be dimly distinguished in the distance, looking like a huge dark cloud.

"Gently, Tom," he added—"gently now! There is no longer the necessity for distressing your poor beast. Take it easy!"

But Tom did not slacken his speed much, for he could not help thinking that the officers were much too close behind them to be pleasant.

"Shall you seek shelter there, Dick?" Maud asked, pointing to the trees.

"I cannot tell at present, but I think it likely that I shall make use of it to baffle them—perhaps we may make our way completely through it."

"As you will—I leave all to you."

The trees now became at each moment more distinct, and Maud was surprised when she perceived the distance to which the wood stretched.

At length its confines were gained; and having reached this point, Dick called to his companion to pull up.

At the same time he drew rein himself, and wheeling Bess round, looked keenly and for a long time in the direction he had just come.

But the darkness completely hid his foes from his sight.

Yet for all this they might be much nearer than would be at all agreeable, and, therefore, he directed Tom Davis to dismount and place his ear against the ground to listen.

Our old friend well understood the art of listening.

He remained stretched at full length for several moments, during which a profound silence was maintained.

At last he rose.

"I can hear nothing at all but that odd rushing sound which you of course must know full well."

"Ay—ay. And nothing else—no hoofbeat?"

"No, captain, nothing like one."

"Then we will not distress our horses any longer, but reserve them for a time of greater need."

"What is it you think of doing?"

"Entering the wood."

"Shall I mount again?"

"Yes, by all means. It will be time enough to walk when we are unable to advance on horseback."

Having thus spoken, Dick once more turned his mare's head towards the trees and rode slowly forward.

Tom Davis speedily followed.

For some time they were able to proceed with but little difficulty.

At last, however, the density of the vegetation compelled them to quit their saddles.

On the way, Dick had been considering somewhat attentively what should be the nature of his future proceedings.

Upon reflection, he considered that he had by no means got far enough from the scene of his late exploit to be very safe, and doubtless ere many hours elapsed a rigid search after him would be instituted.

By what means could he best hope to escape it?

Taking into account the vastness of the wood and the difficulty there must of necessity be in attempting to explore it thoroughly, he could not avoid coming to the conclusion that if he could only find something like a shelter from the open air he could not do better than remain where he was until the first fury of the pursuit should have been expended.

He then made his two companions acquainted with his thoughts, with the justness of which they both agreed.

For some time they continued to push on through the trees, Dick's object being to gain, if possible, about the middle of the wood.

Many were the obstacles they had to surmount, but having overcome them, they looked back upon each as an additional means of defence from their foes.

But suddenly an exclamation escaped Turpin's lips—an exclamation which was at once echoed by Maud.

Chance had directed their steps to one of those open spots so often to be met with in woods of great extent, where, from some cause or other, no lofty vegetation seemed able to flourish.

This open spot was not a glade, though it partook somewhat of that character.

Having been so long in the darkness among the thickly-growing trunks of the old trees, this open space, by contrast, was quite light, and they were able to distinguish every portion of it.

The object which had arrested Dick's attention was a small half-ruined hut, which apparently had been hastily built of the rudest materials.

"Behold," said Dick, pointing towards it, "there is such a shelter as we seek."

"But suppose it is inhabited?" suggested Maud.

"It has not that appearance," Dick responded. "But the point is one which we will quickly ascertain."

"Be careful!"

"I will, depend upon it. Come, there is, I feel assured, nothing to be afraid of."

Nevertheless, Dick took care to have his weapons in readiness for instant use.

A very few steps brought them to the threshold of the hut—though shed would, perhaps, be a more accurate denomination.

Dick pushed open the door hastily, and no sooner had he done so than his nose was assailed by a pungent smell of smoke coming seemingly from a smothered fire.

"There has been some one here recently, that is certain," Dick remarked. "However, we will venture to enter, for all that."

He was just about to cross the threshold when the sharp report of a fire-arm came upon his ears.

The sound caused him involuntarily to come to a standstill.

"What was that?" he said.

"A gun, I fancy," answered Tom Davis.

"Surely—surely," Maud cried, tremblingly, "they cannot have got so close behind us——"

"No—no," said Dick. "Banish that fear; the danger you apprehend is impossible."

"Hush—hush!"

"What is it, Tom?"

"Let us listen"

There was an anxious interval of silence.

"What do you hear, captain?"

"A footstep."

"So do I."

"It is approaching."

"There is no doubt of it. What shall we do?"

"Remain where we are, and abide the result. Only one person is coming, so we have nothing to dread."

In spite of the confident tone in which Dick pronounced these words, Maud suffered great anxiety.

The footstep came nearer and nearer, however, until at length a human form presented itself to their view.

So strange was the aspect of the intruder that all three of our friends gazed upon him with the utmost intentness.

The new-comer, too, as was evident from his actions, was not a little astonished at beholding strangers in the vicinity of the hut.

He threw down some heavy object which he had been carrying, and immediately placed to his shoulder an old rusty firelock that he carried.

"Hold off, there!" he said, in a gruff, surly voice. "Who are you—what do you want?"

"Come forward," was Dick's response. "Lower your gun; we mean you no harm."

With some hesitation the man complied, and again resumed his burden.

As he came nearer he was seen with more distinctness.

He was clad in a strange mixture of ordinary clothing and the skin of deer rudely adapted to wearing purposes.

His face was scarcely to be distinguished, in consequence of the mass of hair with which it was overgrown.

The heavy object he carried proved to be a young fawn.

This, no doubt, explained the shot which they had heard.

"Willingly, master," he said, gruffly, but not as though disposed to be courteous. "What want you here?"

Dick looked at him closely for a moment, and answered:

"Shelter for ourselves and horses. If you furnish us with it and ask no questions we will reward you well."

"Such shelter as I have to offer you," was the reply, "you are welcome to, though I am astonished at the request. But, no matter, I am not inquisitive by nature. If you like to sup with me you are welcome to that too—ha, ha! quite welcome. You can eat as much of my lord's fat fawn here as you like. Ha, ha! quite welcome. Come in—come in. I damped the fire, but you will see a blaze in about a minute. Come in, I say; I don't often have company. Ha, ha!"

CHAPTER MLV.

RELATES THE PARTICULARS OF CLAUDE DUVAL'S UNPARALLELED ADVENTURE.

For the present we leave Dick Turpin and his companions in their new quarters, as other incidents of a more startling character call for our attention.

We go back, then, to the time when the separation of the highwaymen took place.

Of course Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack quickly found themselves to be no longer the objects of the officers' pursuit.

Accordingly they reduced their speed to a leisurely pace which neither distressed themselves nor their horses.

The course taken by Claude Duval quickly took him away from his comrades, and when at length he reined-in his steed he found himself completely alone.

"I can't say I meant this to be the case," he remarked to himself. "I hate to be alone, and I am quite sure I never enjoy an adventure so well as when I have my old comrade Sixteen-String Jack to share it with me."

Claude Duval pronounced these words in tones of deep regret, and, having done so, looked across the country.

"No, no," he muttered, "it is too late now. It would be ridiculous to attempt to overtake Jack now. He is far enough off by this time."

Consequently, very much against his will, Claude found himself completely alone.

"And a whole month to look forward to," he continued. "A nice prospect that, is it not? Well, well, I suppose I must resign myself to it in the same way as I have had to more than one disagreeable thing during my life. But, who knows, I may be fortunate enough to change one of them ere long?"

It was perhaps in order that there should be some probability of the occurrence of this much-wished-for event that he slightly changed his course, keeping, as he judged, in a direction that would take him towards his friend.

Certainly there was never anyone less unsociable than Claude, and, consequently, as may be expected, he continued to give vent to many grumblings as he rode along.

His course for some time lay right across the open country, but at length he reached a point where the meadows were separated by a broad dusty high-road.

Upon reaching this point our old friend stopped for the double purpose of listening and deliberating how he should act, as at present he had formed no plan of operations in his mind whatever.

Not for long, however, did he remain thus in consideration, for no state of inactivity suited him for long together.

Riding along by the side of the hedge with which the meadow was defended from the road, he made his way to a five-barred gate that was a few yards distant.

To dismount, open this, and pass through, was, in his opinion, more agreeable than making a leap over a thorny hedge that was both taller and wider than is usual.

Accordingly he did so, and having gained the high-road, trotted swiftly down it.

"The hour is by no means late," he muttered, "and I may be lucky enough to meet with some one worth crying, 'Stand and deliver!' to. I may as well have all the fun I can while the chance remains to me, as the captain and Tom seem so strongly inclined to rest."

He smiled somewhat contemptuously at this idea, though then he little dreamed to what a disastrous train of circumstances this determination was destined to give rise.

It was just at this moment that the moon peeped out from behind a cloud, thus enabling him to form a much better idea of the nature of his surroundings than he had been able to do before.

The object which first attracted his attention was a large, handsome-looking mansion, which being situated upon the brow of a gently-sloping hill, formed a conspicuous feature in the landscape.

From some of the windows on the ground-floor of this mansion lights were gleaming, and Claude was at once impressed with the air of comfort and happiness which seemed to reign around.

Coming nearer he checked his horse's speed and gazed upon the building, for somehow there even came over him a strange yearning for rest and peace.

"How fortunate must be the lot of the dwellers in that abode," he muttered—"how calm and peaceful their existence—how free from the many hazards and dangers which are the accompaniments of such a career as mine! Yes, yes, I feel I cannot help envying their lot, for it is scarcely possible to conceive discord and misery existing in this fair scene."

This was a most unusual train of thought for the highwayman to indulge in, and for a moment or two he pursued it in silence.

Suddenly, however, the deep silence which had hitherto prevailed around was broken in upon by a low, deep sigh, that perhaps might be more correctly denominated a groan.

Claude started, and then his next act was to back his horse into the shadow.

Scarcely had he taken up a position close to a tall hedgerow than the sound of an approaching footstep reached the highwayman's attentive ears.

He watched eagerly, for already he felt a deep interest in this mansion, and the conviction somehow came over him that the sounds he had just heard were in some way or other connected with it.

He was not for long left in doubt upon this point.

The footstep became louder, and in another moment Claude caught sight of the figure of a young man.

He seemed to leap over a stile, then advancing up the road towards the spot where the highwayman was stationed, paused and gave utterance to a sigh of a character precisely similar to that which Claude had before heard.

It was a sound which indicated the existence of mental agony of no ordinary description.

Duval became more and more interested.

It seemed strange for one so young to be afflicted with so great a sorrow.

He was now within a pace or two of the spot where our friend was, whom he could certainly have seen had he once turned his gaze in that direction.

But he seemed to have eyes for one object, and but one alone.

That was the mansion on the hill.

"Alas!" he exclaimed aloud, little thinking that anyone was near enough to overhear his words—"alas! and must this be my last look—must I now say farewell for ever to those walls which contain all that is dear to me on earth? It is my fate, and I am wretched. Yet, if by some stratagem I could only obtain one parting interview, how much it would solace me in the future! But it is impossible—quite impossible."

The last words were scarcely distinguishable.

After a pause, however, he looked up.

"How peaceful the place seems!" he continued. "What an air of happiness is over all! To gaze upon it as I do now, who would for a moment imagine that a lone and aching heart is beneath that roof; and that, instead of kindness and affection, discord and tyranny reign there? But yet—yet—I cannot say the word farewell!"

It would perhaps be a task of no ordinary difficulty to make the reader sensible of the deep amount of interest with which Claude listened to these incoherent sentences, nor imagine how intensely curious he was to know something more of those mysteries which he felt certain were connected with that peaceful-looking dwelling.

Claude longed to address the stranger, but was unable to think of any satisfactory method of doing so.

At length the young man, having to some extent regained command over himself, exclaimed, in tolerably firm accents:

"Farewell—farewell! I will not say for ever, for even at this moment of deep dejection something whispers to my heart that I shall visit this spot again. For the present only, then, I say farewell!"

As he uttered the last word he turned round hastily and seemed as though he was about to quit the spot with as little delay as possible.

But in changing his position his gaze happened to fall on the forms of the highwayman and his steed.

"Ha!" he ejaculated. "Who is here?"

"A friend," was Claude's answer, as he advanced into the roadway.

The young man gave utterance to a bitter laugh.

"A friend!" he at length exclaimed, scornfully. "But—but why? I know you not—to the best of my knowledge I have never seen you before."

"I may say the same."

"And yet you proclaim yourself my friend."

"I do, and am willing to convince you of my sincerity if you will only give me the opportunity. I think I am not far wrong when I say you need a friend."

"I do—I do!"

"Then do not scruple to call upon me in any way you may think proper."

"But who are you?"

"That matters not. Be contented to know that I am what I first declared myself—a friend."

"But this sudden interest in one who is a perfect stranger——"

"Seems extraordinary, no doubt," interrupted Claude, "but it is nevertheless quite true."

The young man appeared to hesitate for a moment or so, and then, with some hesitation, he said:

"Give me some proof of your good faith."

"It seems strange for one so young to be so doubtful and suspicious."

"It may be," was the sadly-spoken answer, "but I have already paid dearly for over-confidence."

"Then you have been once betrayed?"

"I have, by the friend I trusted most."

"Well, then, if you cannot believe in my sincerity, why, I will just continue my journey, and leave you to do the same."

"Nay, nay!" cried the young man, placing a detaining grasp upon Claude's bridle. "I do not feel inclined to part with you thus."

"As you will. Odd as it may seem, I am at your service. In what way can I aid you? You are in trouble."

"Then you have heard my half-uttered thoughts?"

"Part of them."

"Well, well! Give me a moment to consider upon my course."

"Willingly."

The young man walked away a few steps, then paused, and seemed to fall into a fit of deep reflection.

For some time he continued thus.

At length, coming back, he extended his hand and said:

"I will trust you."

"Without seeking to know more than I choose to communicate about myself?"

"Yes."

"I am agreed," exclaimed Claude, grasping his hand warmly. "Now tell me why it is you feel so much reluctance to bid adieu to this spot. I ask not so much to satisfy my own curiosity, but in order that I may assist you with my advice. and with my strength of arm if necessary."

The young man looked at Claude's muscular form with admiration, and doubtless thought what a powerful ally he would make.

But he manifested considerable reluctance to commence his recital.

The hesitation was no more than natural.

After a pause he said:

"I know not why I should feel this strong inclination to confide in a stranger. It is foreign to my usual feelings, I assure you. But I will yield to my impulse and let you know my sad story in as few words as possible."

Claude prepared himself to listen attentively.

"You must know, then," began the young man, "that an unhappy passion is the cause of all my misery."

"I guessed it."

"I loved and was beloved. I will not tire you by saying more. Our choice was approved of by the occupant of that lordly-looking dwelling, until disgrace—yes, disgrace fell upon our family; yet not through me—through no cause of mine. I was as innocent and unconscious of it as yourself. But my visits were forbidden. I was sternly told that my beloved could never link her destiny with mine, and I was threatened with many penalties if I even attempted to do so much as see her and speak to her again."

"But you did both?"

"Yes, in defiance of the prohibition. Agnes I found unchanged, and looking upon what had occurred as something for which I surely should not bear the blame and be so heavily puuished. We met again and again, and I took a friend into my confidence."

"The one who betrayed you?"

"Yes; Agnes finding her father inexorable, and knowing by former experience that his obstinacy was so stubborn that no earthly consideration would induce him to change his resolution, made her choose rather to take the perilous step of flying with me than suffer herself to be doomed to a life of eternal wretchedness. All was arranged for the flight. The services of a trusty friend alone were needed. I told him all my plans; he promised me his aid; but at the moment when I was about to clasp Agnes in my arms there was a sudden alarm, and her father appeared before me.

"With much difficulty I escaped; and as for my friend, he flattered and fawned upon Mr. Glossin, and at length asked him to bestow Agnes's hand upon him.

"Great Heaven! until then I could not conceive such perfidy existed.

"Agnes, I felt, would remain true to her vows; but then she was unable to help herself, and so great is the terror her father inspires in her that she has no courage to oppose him.

"Since then she has been kept close prisoner, and all my efforts to gain another interview with her have failed.

"On his part he has done all in his power to push on this odious match, and to-morrow morning is the time fixed upon for the celebration of the ceremony. Finding myself foiled at every turn, I gave way to despair, and as I felt that I could not endure to be a witness to her being given to my treacherous friend, or even bear to be anywhere in the vicinity, I determined to bid the place farewell for ever."

"And do you think that a wise determination—such a determination as you ought to make?" asked Claude, who had been listening in attentive silence.

"I—I—I——"

"Do you not think that you ought to have made one more effort? You ought not to forget the motto: 'While there is life there is hope.'"

"And you would bid me hope?"

"Certainly I would. She is not yet lost to you. It will be time enough to despair when she is, not before."

"You animate me with fresh courage," cried the young man, with sudden vehemence; "I feel as though I could dare——"

"Be calm—be calm! There is no occasion for rashness. Let us think the matter calmly over."

"I will think it over, but I cannot promise calmness."

"Well, such calmness as you can command."

"I will."

"In the first place, then, do you think that if you could gain access to her, and if you had the chance of speaking to her for a short time, and if you saw before you the chance of getting clear of the premises with her, do you think she would be willing to accompany you?"

"But," exclaimed the young man, half aghast, "how many 'ifs' are in the case!"

"Yes, yes, I know," returned Claude, somewhat impatiently, "but supposing such a condition of things to exist?"

"But why?—it is utterly impossible."

"You think so?"

"I am certain."

"You should never make too sure of anything. Answer my question: If there was the opportunity would she fly with you?"

"Most certainly."

"You speak confidently."

"I should not deserve her if I doubted her."

"Then I hope you will not be disappointed."

"Disappointed?"

"Yes, for you shall have the opportunity."

"Then you have more than mortal powers."

Claude laughed.

"You never made a greater mistake."

"And yet by mere human aid do you mean to say you will accomplish what you say?"

"I am ready to give you proof of it."

"I am amazed I can scarcely believe that I am not dreaming."

"Take my word, then, that you are not, and let the adventures of to-night teach you never to despair in the future. You will find all the obstacles you speak of vanish like a wreath of snow."

"How—how? Tell me how?"

"Nay, that is my matter. Besides, we have no time to spare. You understand what I intend to do for you?"

"I think so."

"It is to afford you the opportunity of running off with your sweetheart if she is willing to accompany you."

"Do that," said the young man, "and I shall ever account myself your debtor."

"It shall be done, then. All I stipulate is that you must blindly and unhesitatingly obey my commands without stopping to ask why or wherefore. Do you promise this implicit obedience?"

"I do."

"That is well, for upon this will depend everything."

"But at least you will enlighten me a little further—you will not keep me completely in the dark?"

"You shall know all in good time; at present we have not a single second to waste."

"But—but——"

"Do you hesitate already?"

"No—no."

"Then take this riding-cloak of mine, wrap it closely round you, change hats with me, and make as much difference in your outward appearance as the means at hand will permit: your object is to disguise yourself."

"I understand you."

"Then follow me towards the house; I have much to think of by the way."

Fain would this young man have learned something of Claude's intentions, but he could see it would be useless to question him, and he was wise enough not to make the attempt

In truth, Claude had much to arrange.

An idea had occurred to him as regarded a means by which he could accomplish what he had stated; but it was an idea merely, and required much elaboration.

He dismounted at the lodge-gates and left his steed in charge of the lodge-keeper.

This was a strange step for Claude to take, but then he had a motive for it.

The young man muffled himself in the cloak so well, and the change of hats had effected such an alteration, that he passed through the gates in company with his new-found friend without being recognised by the lodge-keeper.

As Claude strode up the well-kept avenue his thoughts were busy indeed.

But his fertile brain quickly enabled him to seize upon the most salient points of his design and reduce them to order.

Long before the front door of the mansion was gained his course was thoroughly determined upon.

From what the reader knows already of Claude Duval, he may feel certain that the highwayman had some further object in view than he allowed to appear.

What this was will in due time be made apparent.

Setting all other things aside, however, it certainly was a most daring act for Claude, with such a price as there was set upon his head, to venture to walk up to the front door of a gentleman's residence without attempting to alter his own character.

But audacity was one of the means he counted upon to obtain success by.

He had already obtained such information as would enable him to know how to act.

On reaching the front door, his first act was to knock loudly at it.

The hour was late, and perhaps that is the reason why so long a time elapsed before the summons was attended to.

Claude knocked a second time, but ere he could relax his fingers from the knocker the door was opened, and an aged domestic appeared.

He seemed rather confused by the darkness, and in a tremulous tone asked what was wanted.

"Will you be kind enough to tell your master that a gentleman who has ridden post haste from London desires to speak to him upon most urgent business?"

"But I cannot disturb him to-night—the hour is late."

"Is he in bed?"

"No, but he is about to retire."

"Then I must see him. Go, deliver the message I have given you."

"What name did you say?"

"I said none—because none is required; simply say what I told you."

The servant was not able to raise any further objection, and therefore retired to deliver the message, having first asked the two visitors to enter the hall.

The invitation was complied with and the door closed.

As soon as ever the old man had retreated a few paces, Claude whispered:

"Now, my young friend, I am going to endeavour to obtain you a licence to go all over this house without being questioned or molested. Do not stare so, I mean what I say."

But the young man continued to stare, for he began to think that he had been so unfortunate as to fall into the clutches of some cunning lunatic.

"You comprehend me? And now all I want of you is to remain patiently on the watch; and as soon as ever you see the opportunity to effect your purpose, embrace it. Hush, hush! You will soon hear more. Remain here and wait."

By this time the domestic returned.

"My master will see you," he said. "Please step this way."

Claude alone advanced, leaving the young man standing near the door with his mind in such a state of confusion and bewilderment as baffles all description.

How he was to act, or how he was to avail himself of the turn of circumstances he knew not.

But, nevertheless, he had the prudence to keep his face well muffled in the cloak, in order to avoid, if possible, the recognition of the old servant, to whom he was well known.

In the meanwhile, Claude had been conducted to a door, which, after tapping slightly, the servant opened.

Claude then found himself in a magnificently-furnished room.

Let the eyes turn whichever way they would, nothing but articles of the utmost value greeted them.

On the centre table was an elegant silver candelabra, in which two wax candles were burning.

The light from these fell upon the countenance of a man of middle age, whose brows seemed contracted by habitual sternness.

He looked frowningly and inquiringly upon Claude as he said:

"May I ask, sir, what is the nature of this business that you think is of so much urgency as to warrant you in disturbing me at this hour of the night?"

From what the young lover had communicated, Claude fully expected this mode of address, and had made up his mind how to reply to it.

"I am exceedingly sorry to disturb you," he said, making a low bow, "but, really, your lordship——"

"No, no—I am no lord."

"Indeed! Then I trust you will pardon my mistake, which you will the more readily forgive, because the beauty and magnificence of this place within and without are such as few lordly dwellings could boast of."

This was touching the proud man in a sensitive place.

His pride was flattered.

"Sit down—sit down," he said, "and let me know your business."

"Certainly. But you will not fail to perceive that the fact of my being ignorant of your rank——"

"Rank?" he interrupted, with a smile. "There is no rank in the case. I am just a simple squire, and no more."

"But you are a magistrate, I believe?"

"Yes—yes! But I am impatient."

"I will not detain you another moment. I come from the chief magistrate at Bow Street, Sir Walter Stanton, as, of course, you well know."

"But has he sent you to me?" asked the squire, in a flutter.

"Not specially to you," was Claude's reply, given with the gravity of a judge. "But you must be kind enough to listen to a brief explanation."

"Well, sir, proceed."

"Then, squire, of course you must have heard of the doings of that band of desperadoes headed by that celebrated highwayman, Dick Turpin?"

"Yes, I have heard. But what of them?"

"Do not alarm yourself, my dear sir—do not, I beg. But you must understand that there has been a great outcry made about the inability of the police force to capture these daring offenders, though they have made many attempts and have been the cause of a great deal of expense."

"Yes," said the squire, "I have heard many speak of this, and all have been unanimous in declaring these repeated failures to be a disgrace to the Government."

"Just so, squire," continued Claude, with much emphasis; "and that will probably account for a disclosure I have to make to you."

"What, about these wretches?"

"Do you mean the police officers?" asked Claude, with difficulty preserving his gravity.

"No, no, of course not—the highwaymen."

"Oh, pardon me—yes. Well, as I was saying, Sir Walter has at last taken this affair into his own hands, in consequence, I fancy,"—and here Claude sunk his voice to a low whisper—"of having received a very pressing communication from high quarters."

"Of what nature?"

"Respecting the inefficiency of the police, and I almost think with something more disagreeable beside. However, as I ought to have told you at first—though doubtless your own penetration has enabled you to guess it—I am the private agent of Sir Walter, the person he employs upon all affairs of secrecy and importance."

"Indeed, sir—is it so?"

"It is. I have the inexpressible honour of representing Sir Walter's person."

The squire bowed upon receipt of this intimation, and then said:

"May I ask to what cause I am indebted for your presence here this evening?"

As soon as the question was asked him, Claude glanced round the apartment with an air of well-affected mysteriousness.

"Prepare yourself for a considerable surprise," he said, in a low voice; "but above all things retain your calmness—on no account make a movement."

The solemnity with which Claude spoke produced a due effect upon the magistrate, who waited in the utmost suspense to hear the disclosure which was about to be made.

"What is it?"

"Are you prepared for strange tidings?"

"Quite," was the answer, though the word was not pronounced with any particular amount of firmness.

"Well, then, squire, I have most certain and indubitable information that—now, be calm—that the celebrated Claude Duval is somewhere about your premises—as I believe, under your very roof."

In spite of his firmness, the squire started from his chair, aghast with surprise.

"My dear sir," continued Claude, "remember what I said to you—be calm!"

"Calm? Calm the devil! How on earth can a magistrate and a gentleman be calm when he knows such a ruffian as Claude Duval is in his house?"

"But, my dear sir, I assure you you will ruin all if you are in the least precipitate—indeed, I would not answer for your valuable life."

This speech moderated the squire somewhat.

Little did he think, however, what a double meaning lurked under every one of Claude's sentences.

"I must entreat you," said the highwayman, "to leave all to me—to do as Sir Walter has done—namely, put the conduct of this night's great business into my despatch."

"Well, sir—well?" said the squire, sinking into his chair again. "What would you say and do?"

"That which, I judge, will prove the best."

"Let me hear it."

"Believe me, I have taken my measures most effectually, and the result will be undoubtedly the rascal's capture."

"Explain—explain! Make haste! Do you not think you are wasting valuable time?"

"By no means, sir. There is no occasion for hurry—not the least in the world."

"Well, you know best."

"I trust, sir, you will put faith in my judgment."

"I will, willingly."

"Then let me assure you that I have watched Claude's every movement, and I at length tracked him here. He has no idea whatever of his danger; but yet I have managed to surround this dwelling in an unbroken circle, the boundary of which I feel confident he cannot pass at any point."

CHAPTER MLVI.

IN WHICH CLAUDE DUVAL CARRIES MATTERS TO EXTREMES.

"THEN, if that is the case," said the squire, "I should think you have been tolerably secure already."

"I should think so if any ordinary individual was in the case; but the many failures which have been made already serve as beacons to warn me against over confidence."

"Just so—just so; you are right. Be good enough to let me into the light of your plans."

"I will do so; and I trust you will approve of them."

The squire inclined his head.

"My object, then, is," said Claude, in a confidential tone of voice, "just to scare this fellow out of his present quarters without letting him have any idea that he is menaced by such a danger as contact with a large body of officers. He will thus be taken by surprise. He will leave the house, and before he goes many yards will encounter the officers. An alarm will be instantly raised, so that escape will be utterly out of the question."

"Capital—capital!" cried the squire, in a transport of enthusiasm. "It would be impossible to devise anything better. It is sure to succeed."

"I am very glad you think so," said Claude, bowing, "though I confess I cannot help flattering myself that it is a good scheme; and if it had been put into execution sooner the rascal would long since have ended his career at Tyburn."

Claude made a wry face as he pronounced the last ominous word.

Like Macbetti's "Amen!" it stuck in his throat.

But the squire was too much absorbed by what he had heard to pay any attention to so trifling a circumstance.

"I never knew anything half so good!" he cried, rubbing his hands together. "But now I have a favour to ask of you."

"Name it, sir—name it," said Claude, though his words were unavoidably tinged with surprise, for he could not imagine what on earth was coming next.

The squire drew his chair closer.

"You see," he said, "that this arrest and capture of the notorious highwayman will be a very great service rendered to the State, and therefore some sort of return ought to be made for it."

Claude, aided by the information he had obtained from the young man, guessed at once to what the squire was alluding.

"Well," he said, "the matter will all fall into my ordinary routine of business, and I shall get no more for it than perhaps a few words of commendation: rather aggravating. I must say, when I know very well that if the work had been performed by any other hand—say, by the activity of a magistrate of high standing, like yourself, for example, such a public service would be rewarded by the bestowal of a knighthood—perhaps, even, the rank of baronet might be conferred."

The squire's eyes glistened like those of some avaricious old miser upon the prospect of obtaining a large amount of gold.

Claude saw that his words had told.

The fact was, the whole and sole dream of this man was the obtainment of some degree of rank or other above that of squire, which he imagined but ill assorted with his social importance.

He grasped greedily at Claude's words.

"Do you really think so?"

"I might say I am sure or it."

"And Claude Duval, you say, is somewhere beneath that roof?"

"I believe I could make bold and certain enough to say he is."

"And—and," continued the squire, with increased excitement and agitation, "you think that if I assisted to capture him—if I took some active steps in the matter—I might anticipate such a return?"

"I do; though, at the same time, there is no occasion for you to put yourself out of the way in the slightest, or run the slightest possible amount of risk."

"And yet achieve the recompense?"

"Certainly."

"How—how? Be good enough to explain yourself?"

"I will, for I think there is a chance of our coming to an understanding with each other."

"An understanding?"

"Yes. Now, as I explained to you, this business will all be reckoned in along with my ordinary business. I shall have no particular recompense for it; but in drawing up my account of the case I could say—of course for a consideration—of what immense service Squire So-and-so was in the management of the affair, and that it is chiefly owing to his exertions and his sage counsel that success has been achieved."

"And you think that the insertion of something to that effect in your report would have the effect you mention?"

"I have little doubt of it."

The squire drew his chair much closer.

"What is the consideration you would require, now, for rendering such a service as that?"

"Whatever you might think it worth."

"Well, well, if I could make sure of it—I say, if I could make sure—I should not mind, say, five hundred pounds."

"It's a bargain, then," said Claude; "for if the result does not follow I will not claim a penny. That's fair, anyway."

"Quite fair; and to show that I am in earnest, and in order that you may have every encouragement to make out your report well, I will give you one hundred on account—as a kind of earnest, you know."

The squire opened a drawer in his writing-table, and took from it the amount he had just mentioned.

Claude pretended to feel some compunctions about receiving it, but it was forced upon him.

"Now, then, that's settled."

The squire, as he uttered the words, sank back in his chair complacently, for he already fancied himself a knight.

Claude coolly pocketed the coin.

"And now," resumed the squire, after a pause, "I am most anxious to know what steps you are going to take to bring about a capture?"

"You shall not be kept a moment longer in suspense. I have no doubt, in the first place, that the rascal entered this house with the intention of robbing you."

"Curse his impudence!"

"Do not be too angry with him. Think what effects will follow from it."

"Yes—yes! Just so! And he is concealed somewhere?"

"Yes—hidden, no doubt."

"How shall you proceed.

"I will tell you. I have, outside in the hall—just by the front door—a very clever and faithful subordinate."

"Well?"

"Yes—I call him 'The Mole,' because he is always so clever at working in the dark, and ferreting people out who are in concealment."

"Yes, yes—I begin to understand."

Claude now began to grow anxious, for he was about to approach the point he had been at so much pains to reach.

But he suffered no trace of his anxiety to display itself.

"What I want you to do is, to allow me to instruct the Mole to go all over the house, and pry into every corner of it. He will soon disturb Mr. Claude, and scare him off. But, mark me, it is important he should be alone. He is an odd fellow—cannot bear anyone to see him at work, and he will not brook the least interference; so I must ask you to give particular instructions to your servants to this effect, for I do not hesitate to assure you that upon Mole depends the entire success of the business we have in hand."

This was another of Claude's equivocal speeches, and he could not suppress a smile at the readiness with which the squire agreed with it.

"Then perhaps you would call and give the necessary instructions?"

The squire placed his hand upon the bell, and was about to ring, when some one tapped at the door.

Claude started, for this was an unexpected event, and he wanted to know what it meant

"Come in!" cried the squire.

The door opened, and the old servant appeared upon the threshold.

It needed only one glance at the fellow's countenance to let Claude know that he had made some important discovery, and was about to communicate it to his master.

What the discovery was, Claude guessed rightly, and he at once set about counteracting it.

He knew quite well, as if he had been told so, that the old man had recognised the young man in the hall, and was about to apprise his master of the discovery.

If he succeeded in his intent the whole affair would be ruined, which would have been serious to Claude, who was not half done with the pompous old squire yet.

"Master," said the old man, "there is in the hall—close to the front door——"

"Yes, yes," interrupted Claude, boldly—"the squire knows all about it."

The old man stared with amazement, and then managed to utter:

"But this young man, master——"

"Yes, yes!" interrupted Claude. "You see, squire," he added, "that the interference has begun, and really, if Mole is crossed, I tremble for the result—the whole scheme will inevitably fall to the ground."

"But——" interposed the old man again, vainly endeavouring to make himself heard and understood.

"My dear sir," interrupted Claude again, purposely speaking in a loud tone, "will you allow me to give the necessary instructions to your servant? It is most important they should be attended to."

"Yes, yes—by all means do so!"

"Now, listen to me," began Claude, fixing his eyes sternly upon the old man. "The person in the hall you are to allow to go wherever he thinks proper about the premises, and you are on no account to follow him, to watch him, or interrupt or interfere with anything he may be doing, nor are you to allow anyone else on the premises to do so. Now, do you understand that?"

"Yes, sir; but——"

"Let us have no buts in the case—I am not in the habit of having my orders questioned. I believe I spoke quite clearly, squire, did I not?"

"Quite so—quite!"

"Then perhaps this fellow wishes for the satisfaction of hearing you say he is to carry into execution the orders I have just issued?"

"Yes," said the squire. "Williams, mind you obey those orders to the letter, and don't let us have any of your d—d officious interference!" he concluded, seeing that the old man was again about to speak.

Claude had purposely exalted his voice while speaking, so that every word should reach with distinctness the ears of the young lover, who listened with an amazement not to be conceived.

"I will just speak to him," said Claude, as the old man was about to leave the room.

He advanced to the door as he spoke, and beckoned the young man to approach.

"The squire has given his permission for you to go all over the house at your pleasure, and has given orders that no one shall interfere with you in any way; so be off quickly! The sooner you get the business over the better."

The young man nodded, to show that he comprehended the hidden meaning of Claude's words, though he was so amazed at the extraordinary turn events had taken that he could not help thinking that he was being made the sport of some fantastic dream.

But his amazement and bewilderment were, if possible, excelled by the old man, who had not yet recovered from the shock.

But Claude held the door for him to retire, and closed it after him as speedily as possible.

"You heard your master's orders," said the young man, with a menacing gesture. "Beware how you attempt to disobey them in any particular!"

So saying, he bounded towards the staircase with rapid steps.

As for the old man, he was overwhelmed.

Throwing up his hands, he said:

"Well, well—who would have thought of this? I am either daft or else my master is clean, stark-staring mad!"

In the meanwhile, the young lover, with a fast-beating heart, ascended the noble staircase.

He knew full well in which chamber Agnes was secluded, and he made his way to it without delay.

He reached the door in safety, and having done so, all his strength appeared to forsake him.

He caught his breath in short and sudden gasps.

But he was conscious that time was passing—that such an opportunity as this could never occur again, and that every moment was precious.

This enabled him to summon up courage to knock.

The door was opened by Agnes herself, upon whom no further restraint had been placed than not being allowed to leave the house unless in company with some one.

Upon catching sight of her lover, she uttered a faint shriek, which would have been a louder one had he not, with admirable presence of mind, clasped her in his arms and stopped her breath with a fervent kiss.

"Hush—hush, my darling—do not make a sound!"

With some little trouble, Agnes disengaged herself.

"I—I thought it was my maid, Ada."

"But you were wrong."

"Oh, fly—fly, Herbert—do not linger here! I must not speak to you—indeed I must not!"

"But you must listen," he said, grasping her wrist.

[DICK TURPIN ON THE LOOK-OUT AT STONEHENGE.]

"The time has come to show whether your love for me is real or visionary. The time has come for you to make your choice."

"What mean you?"

"You look but little like a bride," he went on, vehemently, without heeding her interruption. "There are even now traces of undried tears upon your cheeks—your eyes are red and swollen—your cheeks pale and haggard. Surely I may judge from this that you are not happy?"

"Happy?" she echoed in a tone of so much agony that it cut him to the heart.

"You do not seem as though you were anxious for to-morrow's ceremony."

"Oh, Herbert!" she exclaimed, with a outburst of tears—"why do you address me thus?"

"Because I want your decision."

"Decision?"

"Yes—the way to escape lies open before you, if you like to avail yourself of it."

"Escape?"

"Yes. Why do you echo my words so strangely?"

"Oh, Herbert, I am nearly mad—almost distracted!"

"Tell me, then," said her lover—"will you embrace this present and unlooked-for opportunity to fly with me, and give me that power over you which no one can contravene; or will you remain here, and doom yourself to lifelong misery and degradation as the bride of a man you have assured me you detest, and who should be abhorred by all for his black treachery?"

"Hush, hush—you are mad with excitement! By what means came you here?"

"By a train of most extraordinary circumstances which I now cannot pause to relate. You shall know all presently."

"But—but——"

"Take my word, Agnes, the way of escape lies open before us at the present moment, though how long it will remain so is very doubtful."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite—quite. Let me ask you once more, will you come—will you make me happy for the remainder of my existence, or render me the most wretched being on the face of the earth?"

But Agnes was greatly agitated.

The utterly unlooked-for appearance of her lover had taken her by surprise—so much so that she could not all at once recover proper command over her mental faculties.

Then she could not bring herself to believe in the reality of the statement he had made respecting the possibility of escape.

Herbert saw her excessive agitation, and with admirable presence of mind did all he could to abate it.

His efforts were crowned with more success than he had dared to anticipate.

He gave her a brief outline of what had occurred to him. But considering the agitated state of both, and that the young man himself was considerably in the dark, it may readily be believed that the narrative was excessively incoherent, if not incomprehensible.

"Once more, dear Agnes," he said, in calmer accents, "will you fly with me—will you be mine? You have no other means of securing your future happiness in this life if you love me as you say you do."

"Heaven knows, Herbert, I do love you!"

"Then come with me—come with me, I entreat you! Hesitate no longer."

"But by what means shall we escape?"

"The easiest in the world. Come down the staircase with me, and we will pass out of the front door."

"You are mad! It is an impossibility!"

"I tell you it is not; take my word for it our departure will not be hindered. Quick—quick, put on some outer garments, for the night air is very chill, and above all be speedy, or after all we may be intercepted and the chance lost."

Agnes appeared by this time fully to have made up her mind.

With great haste she assumed a bonnet and shawl.

Then, trembling with agitation, she took hold of her lover's arm.

All within the house was very still.

He led her to the staircase.

Again they paused to listen.

Then they descended.

Scarcely, however, had they reached half-way when the door of the room in which the squire sat, was opened.

Herbert's heart stood still.

He felt that the chance was gone.

Agnes felt as though she should faint.

"Courage, darling," Herbert whispered—"courage and silence! Perhaps even now all may yet be well."

CHAPTER MLVII.

CLAUDE DUVAL BRINGS HIS DROLL ADVENTURE TO A CONCLUSION.

LEAVING the lovers in this state of incertitude and fear, we will return to the apartment where we left Claude Duval and the worthy squire upon such apparent good terms with each other, and where events of a most interesting character were taking place.

"If there is one thing I hate," said Claude Duval, as he closed the door, "it is a meddling domestic who is not content to take orders as he receives them, but must, forsooth, stop to favour you with his own views upon the subject."

"It is indeed annoying," assented the squire; "but it is a kind of presumption which old servants often take upon themselves. But come, sit down, we have other matters to talk about just now."

"Yes, yes—very true."

"I suppose we shall soon hear an alarm?"

"No, I apprehend not. Mole does his work quietly. Moreover, I took upon myself to impress upon him very particularly that, above all things, he was not to allow any kind of a disturbance to take place beneath this roof. 'Now, Mole,' I said, 'one word is enough; the row must be all out of doors. It was consideration for the different members of your honour's family that made me issue these commands," Claude added.

The squire, of course, could not help confessing that he was vastly obliged.

"By-the-way," he said, "I have heard that this Claude Duval is a devilishly gentleman-like fellow—been a soldier, or something of that kind abroad, I have been told. I should uncommonly like to see the fellow."

"I think you are very likely to have your curiosity gratified."

"Egad, yes, I hope so! But you will excuse me for making the remark?"

"Oh, certainly!"

"Well, then, I must say—going, of course, altogether upon report—that—that——"

"What?"

"That you bear no very distant resemblance to the individual in question."

Claude laughed loudly and heartily.

"A proof of your penetration, squire—a good proof of it! I do believe myself that this rascally Claude Duval has the impudence to bear some resemblance to me. That is one reason why I should be glad to have him tucked up, because it might be unpleasant to be taken for a highwayman under some circumstances."

"I should think so."

"Fortunately, I am well known, and therefore it is not likely to cause me any inconvenience. By-the-way, squire, talking of Claude Duval, I could tell you some extraordinary incidents in connection with him."

"No doubt. I have heard that he possesses an amount of audacity which it is hard to believe is possessed by any mortal person."

"Perhaps you would like to listen to his last exploit; though, I forget, perhaps it may already have reached your ears?"

"No—no; I should, above all things, like to hear an authentic account."

"Well, this is a most barefaced and impudent affair—most shameless, disgraceful trick."

"I am all impatience to hear the particulars of it."

"Then I will gratify you without further delay."

The squire prepared to listen attentively.

Claude began.

"I have been credibly informed," he said, "that this Claude Duval, by some most audacious means, succeeded one night in gaining admittance to a gentleman's mansion, as, for instance, this may be."

"Indeed! What were the means made use of?"

"Well, there I am by no means credibly informed, more than one version having reached me. However, it is certain that the rascal actually had the boldness not only to penetrate into the mansion, but also to gain a private interview with the occupant, a very worthy though somewhat gullible gentleman."

"But how did he contrive to obtain this interview? I can only judge by myself; I am quite certain he could never do it here."

"I should think not," assented Claude, with a hearty laugh. "He would hardly try it on with a magistrate."

"No—no."

"Still, Claude Duval is no ordinary freebooter, and must not be judged by any ordinary standard."

"I suppose not."

"It would be most unjust to do so."

"Well, well, proceed. You say that he succeeded in obtaining a private interview with a gentleman."

"Yes, the very owner and occupier of the mansion he was about to plunder: but of course there was nothing so vulgar in his case as an ordinary burglary."

It was now the squire's turn to laugh.

"I must confess," he said, "that I am unable to see these very fine differences."

"Very likely."

"But go on—pray go on with your tale."

"I will do so; I am glad it interests you."

"It does. But ought we not to hear something of—of——"

"Mole, I suppose you mean. Oh, you leave the business to him. I'll be bound it is all right."

"I will take your word."

"Well, to go on, I am told that before he had been talking long with the gentleman—who, I must tell you had no more idea he was talking to a highwayman than you have—I say the interview had not lasted long before he actually gammoned some money out of his pocket."

"I suppose you mean Claude Duval gammoned some money out of the gentleman's pocket?"

"Just so—just so. I did not express myself very clearly. The amount was large, however."

"Pray continue."

"Well, the conversation went on very agreeably for some time longer, and then this highwayman asked the gentleman if he had heard Claude Duval's last trick—just as I might have asked you, you know.'

"The fellow really did that?'

"Undoubtedly."

"Then d—n his impudence!"

"How strange! That was the very remark I made when I first heard of it."

"It's very odd!"

"You will say so when you hear the conclusion of the adventure."

"Do not keep me in suspense any longer, then."

"I will not, depend upon it."

"Proceed."

"Well," continued our friend, "I must tell you, Claude got up without the gentleman having the remotest suspicion of who he was, and said that this last trick was the best that ever was heard of, and added he could show it much better than he could explain it."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, Claude got up just as I might get up now."

Claude suited the action to the word.

"Yes—yes."

"Well, now, squire, just for the fun of the thing, suppose yourself to be the gentleman I have been mentioning."

"The gullible gentleman?"

"Yes—precisely."

"And you?"

"Why, I—likewise, just for the fun of the thing—will personate the highwayman: you must imagine me to be the notorious Claude Duval himself."

"Indeed! Upon my word, I must say you look the character perfectly well."

"Ha, ha! Good! That's a capital joke! Only, if I had not so great a respect for you as I have, I might retort by saying just the same thing of yourself."

The squire, in spite of his determination to keep on good terms with his visitor, nevertheless looked annoyed at the freedom of this last speech.

But our old friend rattled on.

"You comprehend, squire, that for a time we have changed characters?"

"Yes; though what this is all to lead to I cannot think."

He spoke impatiently.

"I will not tantalise you any longer," Claude answered. "In the first place, then, the rascally highwayman's words were something like these—as near like them as my memory will serve."

"Well, what did he say?"

"Something like this: 'Would you believe it, squire, this Claude Duval, as I am credibly informed, stood before the gentleman and asked the squire for his watch—just as I might ask you," added our friend, stretching out his hand and taking hold of the tremendously thick gold chain which festooned over his dupe's waistcoat.

"But—but——" said the squire, grasping the chain as well.

"Excuse me," interrupted Claude—"just allow me for a moment—I merely want to show you."

The squire's watch was in his hand while he spoke.

He slipped it at once into his coat-pocket.

"Well," he continued, "this gullible gentleman looked rather blue upon seeing his watch disappear—just as you might now."

"But I don't understand you."

"You will in a moment though—you will see that the whole was an ingenious device upon Claude Duval's part to commit a robbery in a pleasant manner—without the least violence or noise, you know."

"Well, well, I suppose so; but I am anxious to reach the end of your tale."

"Your anxiety will not last many moments longer."

"I am glad to hear it."

"Well, Claude next took the gentleman's snuff-box—just as I might take yours now, you know—and slipped it into his coat-pocket after the watch, thus."

As our friend spoke the snuff-box disappeared.

"But I assure you, sir——" the squire began.

"Excuse me," cried Claude, drowning the squire's voice by speaking in loud tones, "I will not detain you a moment longer: I will just trouble you to lend me those rings a moment. There—thank you!"

The squire passively suffered himself to be despoiled of his rings, which immediately went to keep company with the other articles in Claude's pocket.

"Now for this diamond pin in your scarf. That's it."

"But do you mean to tell me, sir," said the squire, sitting very upright in his chair—"do you mean to tell me that the gentleman was so truly gullible as to sit still and allow his jewellery to be taken from him in this fashion?"

"I do assure you such was the case—just as you might sit now."

"Then I mean to say that he was a d—d fool! And now, Mr. Agent, or whatever you call yourself, be good enough to return me my things and finish your tale."

"Fair and softly, sir! I am already at the conclusion. I have only to tell you that the gentleman began to grow suspicious; and so Claude outs with a pistol, just as I might now."

"Now don't—don't! What do you want to point that thing at me for? Turn it away, can't you?"

"But I am showing you what Claude Duval did."

"D—n Claude Duval!"

"With all my heart! But, nevertheless, he pointed the pistol thus, and calmly requested the gentleman to hand him his purse and pocket-book in order that he might come to the end of the matter."

The squire now began to have some very serious doubts as to whether the matter was a jest or something serious.

But for the state of bewildered confusion he had been in ever since Claude's arrival, he might have been able to come to a correct conclusion upon the matter.

He thought, perhaps, that as the pistol continued pointed so menacingly towards him it would be best to look upon it as a joke.

It was therefore with an affectation of jocoseness that he handed over the articles for which our friend so audaciously asked.

"If the gentleman was gullible enough to do this," he said, "he was a fool, and deserved to lose what he parted with so readily."

"Squire, you have exactly hit upon my sentiments."

"But the comedy is played out now, I should hope?"

"Very nearly. However, you may as well hear the concluding scene, by which time I hope we shall hear something of Mole."

Claude really did wish this, as now, having succeeded in his designs so far, he was most anxious to know whether the young man had succeeded in getting clear of the house or not.

"I hope so, too," added the squire. "But go on."

"Well, then, just to finish, I must tell you that Claude Duval, having succeeded so far, blew the candles out—just as I blow out these—walked across the room, opened the door, passed out, and——"

While speaking these words the reader must understand that Claude accompanied each with its corresponding action.

He passed out of the door and closed it after him.

Of course what he said could no longer be heard then.

But a suppressed howl—apparently of remonstrance and discontent—reached him from the apartment.

Claude rapidly turned the key in the lock, and then tapped upon the panel.

"Hullo!" said the squire, gruffly. "Have you done?"

"Yes," answered Claude, through the keyhole.

"Then come in, and let the candles be lighted. I'll be d—d if I don't think the joke has been carried a little too far!"

It was at this moment that Claude looked anxiously around, in the hope of catching sight of the young lovers.

His quick eye at once detected the two shrinking forms upon the staircase.

He made a rapid but unmistakable sign.

They both descended.

"This is my new and unknown friend," whispered the young man—"the one to whom I am solely indebted for my present happiness."

Just at this juncture the bell in the squire's room was rung most furiously.

Probably by this time the conviction had settled upon his muddy-pated intellect that he had been most egregiously duped.

Finding that an immediate response to his summons was not given, he rushed across the apartment and thundered away at the door with both hands and feet in a most reckless and unmagisterial manner.

"Quick quick!" said Claude.

Williams had left the hall in order to make his fellow-servants in the kitchen acquainted with what was going on up above.

He now made his appearance near the foot of the staircase; probably he came in answer to the vigorous peal upon the bell.

It is certain, however, that the first glance sufficed to give him a tolerably correct idea of the exact state of affairs.

In defiance, then, of the injunctions which had been so strictly laid upon him, he rushed forward and endeavoured to prevent the departure of his master's daughter and her lover.

But he was too late.

The hall door had been already opened, the broad perron descended, and by the time he had reached the threshold the fugitives were fast disappearing in the gloom.

He raised a loud outcry for the purpose of alarming the remainder of the inmates of the dwelling.

Just as he did so he heard a terrific crash.

Passion had lent the old squire momentary strength sufficient to enable him to burst open the door of the room in which he had been confined.

He rushed to the front door.

"After them," he cried—"after them! If you are speedy you will have them! Run—I will follow you!"

Williams scarcely waited to hear the remainder of this speech, but dashed down the steps with alarming swiftness.

Claude saw him coming, with the angry squire hard at his heels.

He could not help laughing at the ridiculous figure which both cut.

But he remembered that the young lovers were not yet free from the squire's premises, nor were they, so far as he could tell, provided with the means for making a rapid flight.

This reflection induced him to attempt to put a stop to the headlong course of Williams and the squire.

Accordingly, our friend ran on in the steps of the fugitives, but at such a pace that he felt sure the squire and his companion must inevitably overtake him.

"Quick—quick!" cried the squire. "Seize the villain—seize him! He has no end of my money and valuables about him!"

Williams redoubled his efforts, and shot somewhat ahead of his master.

Claude saw that the moment for putting his preconceived stratagem into execution had come.

"Not so fast, Mr. Williams," he remarked to himself.

As he spoke, he dropped with great suddenness upon his hands and knees.

Williams saw him, but was not able to check his speed.

His feet became entangled, and down he fell, shooting over Claude's body with great swiftness, and grazing the ground to a considerable distance.

The squire beheld the downfall of his dependant, but was not able to put any material check upon his speed.

Claude, however, who had obtained some slight injuries about the ribs, caused by the thick-soled boots Williams wore, rose to his feet.

The squire, rushing on, came full upon his servant as he was in the act of rising.

The consequence was that both lay sprawling on the gravel path in a moment

A furious struggle ensued, caused by the haste both were in to rise, and this very haste for a time defeated its own object.

Leaving them thus, Claude hurried off in the direction of the lodge gates.

He was most anxious to recover possession of his horse, without which he felt his chances of safety would be very small.

Moreover, he was not able to see anything of the lovers.

Quite heedless of the havoc which he committed upon the various flower-beds that lay in his way, Claude directed his course in a perfectly straight line, thus saving much time, for the gravel path wound round in a very ostentatious manner.

He reached his destination in a very few minutes.

He was glad to see his gallant steed just where he had left it, with the gatekeeper standing near.

The latter was looking anxiously towards the house, from which direction loud, tumultuary sounds came upon his ears.

"Quick—quick!" said Claude, as he drew nearer.

"What is the matter, sir?"

"Matter? Why, the house is attacked by robbers! Run up as fast as you can; but open the gate first, as I am going to gallop off for assistance."

This, though startling, was probable, intelligence, and accordingly the gate was opened without demur.

Claude vaulted into the saddle with one bound, and was out in the road in a twinkling.

"Now," he cried, "run up to the house. Your master is furious at your absence."

With these words he galloped off, without waiting to see whether his commands were attended to or not.

But he went only a short distance, for he pulled up as soon as he was able in order to ascertain what had become of the young couple.

Riding slowly forward, he kept a vigilant look-out but without success.

Still he was unwilling to leave until he had seen them, once more and satisfied himself that they were in a fair way for safety.

All at once, however, he heard a shout, and immediately perceived the squire accompanied with several of his domestics.

They were all mounted, and carried with them an odd assortment of defensive weapons.

About such antagonists as these it is not likely Claude would have given himself much trouble; but, as ill luck would have it, another shout came to him from the rear, and before he could turn round to ascertain its source the report of a pistol followed.

"Officers!" ejaculated our friend, as he gave a hasty glance around him. "I must be off and leave the young people to their own resources. They may have got shelter by this time!"

This was scarcely likely, but it was more agreeable for Claude to think thus than otherwise

When the pistol was discharged he was out of range, and now he immediately urged his horse to full gallop

Claude began to fear that these officers might be induced by the magistrate to commence a search after the young people; and if so, they could scarcely escape it.

But the squire and his servants all called out:

"A robber—a robber!—a highwayman!"

"Claude Duval!" yelled one of the officers, as the troop dashed by. "I knew him at a glance, and wish I had been a little nearer when I fired."

Claude slightly reduced his speed.

"I will lead them to suppose that they stand a tolerably good chance of overtaking me, and that will decoy them from this place, and so give the lovers a better chance of securing their future happiness."

This was a very generous act for Claude to perform, for he ran no ordinary risk in thus playing with his foes.

The bait was snapped at greedily.

"His horse is blown," cried one. "Push on—push on, we are bound to have him!"

But after about half an hour's hard riding they had the inexpressible mortification of discovering that they had not gained on the object of their pursuit in the slightest degree.

"I think the farce has lasted long enough now," Claude muttered, as he looked behind him and saw that the officers' cattle seemed fearfully tired. "I will now shake them off and cause them to open their eyes a little bit. Here goes!"

With these words he spurred his horse slightly.

The animal answered freely and readily to the incentive.

During this time the highwayman had, to use his own phrase, been "nursing" his steed, and consequently away it went at a prodigious rate.

The officers were so overcome with surprise that they were rendered speechless—indeed, motionless, for they only retained their seats mechanically.

A more aggravating occurrence than this could hardly be conceived after indulging so fondly in the belief that success would ere long crown their efforts.

But they instinctively felt that their hopes were frustrated this time, and we leave them to get over their disappointment in the best way they were able.

In the meanwhile, Claude Duval, having got quite clear from pursuit, began to wonder where he should take up his quarters so as to remain concealed during the day which was just about to dawn.

CHAPTER MLVIII.

TOM KING MAKES SIXTEEN-STRING JACK HIS CONFIDANT.

THE course of the narrative now reverts to the proceedings of Dick Turpin's two other companions on the night in question.

At the time of separation, Sixteen-String Jack had determined to rejoin Claude at the earliest moment possible, but this intention was prevented by the great speed made by the horse of the latter.

All at once, however, Jack heard a loud cry.

Turning round, he saw Tom King hastening towards him.

He at once checked his speed, and slightly altered his course, so as to allow his comrade to join him as speedily as possible.

They were already out of sight of the officers, who as we have already stated, had elected to pursue Dick Turpin.

"What is it, Tom," asked Jack, as soon as he was able to make his voice heard.

"Nothing particular, only as we got rid of the Philistines so easily I felt most reluctant to remain solitary, and so I thought you might be inclined to join with me."

"With all my heart, for I hate loneliness above all things."

"Where is Claude?"

"Galloped off, as though he had a score of his foes at his heels. Perhaps we shall meet with him presently, for he likes anybody's company better than his own."

"We are all alike in that respect, I think."

"Yes; let us ride on. Perhaps we shall catch sight of him ere long."

His hope was, however, destined to prove a fallacious one.

"Well, we will leave him to his own devices, Jack," said Tom, as he reined-in his steed.

"I suppose we can do nothing else."

"Nothing; and besides, it is a very long time indeed since we had an adventure together, so that if we do not separate there will be some novelty in that."

"I am quite willing to remain with you."

"Then, in the first place, let us make up our minds as to what we shall set about doing."

"What have you in your mind?"

"If you must know, I have been thinking of that treasure of which the captain spoke?"

"That which you frightened the officers out of."

"Just so."

"Well, what about it?"

"Why, it is necessary that we should get it moved to somewhere near to our appointed meeting-place, and as there is no knowing where we may be drifted to in the course of a week or so, I think it would be wisest to unearth it now."

"And proceed at once in the direction of Stonehenge?"

"Yes."

"I am inclined to be of the same opinion."

"Then let us waste no more time in discussion, but commence at once."

"With all my heart!"

This determination having been arrived at, the two highwaymen at once changed the direction in which they had been travelling, making their way back towards the Jolly Tar Inn.

"Are you sure you can find the place again, Tom?" asked Sixteen-String Jack.

"Yes, I took accurate note of it, and have no doubt I can ride to the spot at once."

"That is all right then. And now, Tom, my friend, I am most anxious to know what you really think about this project of leaving England for a time."

"I approve of it."

"I fancied so. But how resolved the captain seems! It is odd to me if it is not Maud we have to thank for this alteration."

"Then you would rather stay?"

"Not to remain by myself; but still, personally, I do not feel inclined to adopt this course."

"Then believe me, Jack, it will be a wise thing for us all, and I hope ere long to be able to bring you to my way of thinking."

Jack shook his head.

"You may be incredulous now, but wait and see."

"I am reconciled to it, and shall remain so, because I think no harm can possibly come of it."

Little did Jack think then that he never made a greater mistake in his life.

"We have been successful for a long time," continued Tom King; "and as all things in existence must come to an end at some time or other, so must our good luck. Besides, a rest would be by no means disagreeable after the hurry and bustle we have had lately."

"Well, it may be so. But, Tom, just tell me whether I am right in this supposition."

"What is it?"

"Why, I fancy you have some other reason for this than you have yet given anyone."

Tom was silent.

"Tell me now—am I right?"

"You are."

"Then what is this consideration? I felt convinced one existed of some kind or other. Let me know what it is, and it may have equal weight with me."

"I feel pretty certain it would not"

"Would not?"

"You seem surprised!"

"I am exceedingly so; and, what is more, I am very curious as well, and shall not rest satisfied until that curiosity is satisfied."

"Then, if that is the case," answered Tom, and forcing a laugh while he spoke, "I may as well tell you at once."

"Do so—pray do so!"

Tom hesitated a moment, and then, ashamed of displaying so much reluctance, acquainted his friend with his strange adventure with the hag, and repeated her prediction.

"And why have you not spoken of this before?"

"Because I felt a strong disinclination to do so. I fancied that I should be laughed at for being influenced by the impotent rage of an old woman."

"Then let me tell you I consider it in another light."

"You do not for a moment imagine that the prophecy will come true, do you? Dick Turpin is my best friend, and if I do not die until he deprives me of existence, I shall make sure of a good long life."

Jack was silent.

"What do you say?" asked his friend.

"Who? I? Why, if you must know, I would rather not say anything."

"Then that is equivalent to telling me that you place some dependence upon the prognostication?"

"You can think so if you like."

"But, Jack, I did not think that—that——"

"That what? Out with it!"

"That you were so superstitious."

"I knew that is what you would say. But I happen to remember very vividly something which appears to have slipped your recollection altogether."

"What is it? It is now my turn to feel curious."

"Can you not guess?"

"No."

"Well, then, I was thinking of the shadow on the wall!"

Jack shuddered as he pronounced the words.

He always did when the awful, mysterious, and seemingly supernatural event he had just mentioned was forcibly brought to his mind.

The recollection made Tom feel exceedingly uncomfortable.

"We are on a disagreeable topic now" he said—"let us change it."

"Just as you please. The subject is one I never care to talk about."

"Then cease."

"I will," muttered Jack to himself. "But I shall not forget the gipsy's prophecy for all that."

They rode on for some time in silence, nor, indeed, was a word spoken until Tom suddenly exclaimed:

"Here we are, my friend! And now, if you will dismount and lend me your assistance, we will quickly uncover the valuables."

Sixteen-String Jack looked well about him, and finding that, to all appearances, they had the place quite to themselves, he quitted the saddle and set to work.

The earth was soft, and was soon removed by means of their swords.

"It is only just below the surface," Tom remarked. And then immediately added: "Here it is!"

He pulled out the bundle as he spoke.

It was bulky, and they began to wonder how they should carry it.

"Let us divide the whole," said Tom. "We shall find room somehow or other, depend upon it."

The bundle was opened, and the glittering contents displayed to view.

Jack's eyes sparkled, and, without hesitation, he followed his comrade's example of filling all his pockets.

When this operation was brought to a conclusion, a considerable quantity remained; but this they disposed of by filling the small leather pouches which were under the flaps of their saddles.

Thus loaded, it would be by no means comfortable to travel, which made them still more determined to make their way to Stonehenge without further loss of time.

"There is one thing," remarked Jack, as they commenced their journey—"we shall be almost unknown to that part of the country, I should think."

"Yes, we can bear that in mind when we think upon our future proceedings."

"Forward, then."

The long journey they had before them was now commenced.

On the way, however, Sixteen-String Jack manifested great impatience, and his feelings with respect to the project for quitting England for a time underwent a complete alteration.

The gipsy's prophecy was continually uppermost in his mind; and though he could by no means see how it was likely to be fulfilled, yet he set about doing all he could to prevent the occurrence of such a catastrophe, thus strangely contradicting himself in his belief, as, if such was doomed to be the case, he knew full well no exertions of his could change the decrees of fate.

His manner did not fail to produce a deep impression upon Tom King, whose mind became overwhelmed with gloom.

Without confessing so much to each other, both felt that a calamity of no ordinary nature was impending over them.

CHAPTER MLIX.

TOM KING AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK HAVE A SINGULAR ADVENTURE ON THE COAST, AND MAKE ARRANGEMENTS FOR A DEPARTURE FROM ENGLAND.

"THAT, then, is Stonehenge?"

The words were uttered by Sixteen-String Jack, as he came in sight of the picturesque ruins which bear this name.

The time was early morning, and the first rays of the rising sun glinted redly upon the masses of unhewn stones about the uses and origin of which so much diversity of opinion exists.

"And you have never been in this part of the country before?" said Tom King, interrogatively, as he gazed upon the sublime scene before him.

"Never. Have you?"

"Many—many times."

"It's an odd thing, Tom, but you seem familiar with every place—you seem to know your way wherever you may chance to be."

"I had opportunities for travel when I was young," he answered, in a sad voice—"opportunities falling to the lot of very few."

"And you made good use of them."

"I did."

Sixteen-String Jack did not pursue the subject any further, for he knew how much it pained his friend to have the past brought vividly before him.

"It is a beautiful sight," continued Tom, still gazing at the ruins—"one which I have always much admired."

"And very lonely."

"Yes, exceedingly so. The chances are quite against our being disturbed by anyone."

"Forward, then, my friend! And I hope for the next twelve hours or so we shall be left in peace."

"Your hope is in a fair way of being fulfilled, I think," said Tom, as he directed his weary horse towards their destination.

Since taking their resolution, the highwaymen had by no means let the grass grow under their feet, while such was the caution they exercised that they felt tolerably certain they had left no track behind them.

The very secrecy which had attended all their movements deprived them of any unusual amount of interest.

They had been most careful to avoid adventures of every kind, in order that their presence in that part of the kingdom might be wholly unknown and unsuspected.

A few minutes enabled them to cross the open piece of ground which lay between them and the ruins.

When once here, the huge mass of stone-work served to conceal them completely.

"Years ago," said Tom, "there used to be the remains of a wooden hut, in which dwelt an old woman who used to obtain a livelihood by begging from the visitors to the place."

"And is she here now?"

"If she is, her age must be patriarchal, for at the time of which I speak her age was extreme, and her hut little more than a few old pieces of blackened timber roughly nailed together. But step this way, and we shall soon find out whether any such place now exists."

Sixteen-String Jack followed his comrade, and after threading a way among the huge stones they came to a remote spot where such a building as Tom had described was standing.

"The hut is here," he said, "but whether its inmate is we must find out."

There was not much difficulty about this.

The crazy door was swinging idly open, as though inviting them to enter.

Crossing the threshold, the highwaymen entered the hut, which the first glance showed to be completely empty.

"Some time has elapsed since it was inhabited, I fancy," said Jack.

"There is every appearance of it."

"Still, it will afford us shelter from the weather. And now, then, what is the first thing to be done?"

"To rebury the treasure."

"What, here?"

"Yes, we can conceal it easily"

"As you like. I am quite tired of carrying so heavy a load about with me."

In fact, now Tom came to make a closer examination of these valuables, he found that they represented a much larger sum than he had previously imagined—so much more, in fact, that he was sure that this alone would be sufficient to warrant them in leaving England for a time.

Without any loss of time, this wealth was deposited in one corner of the wooden hut, and covered over with a small quantity of loose earth.

"Now for a rest," said Tom King; "and when night comes we can talk over what we are to do next."

Sixteen-String Jack willingly assented, for their journey had been a most fatiguing one.

But although both were weary and to all appearance in perfect safety, they did not neglect their general precaution of watching and sleeping alternately.

In this way the day passed without the occurrence of anything to disturb them.

When twilight was deepening, they held their consultation.

It did not last long, and the result of it was that they rode away from their new quarters, making their way towards the sea-coast.

They had determined to engage a vessel at the nearest point to take them across the channel, so that when the whole of the party arrived there should be no delay on this account.

By hard riding they reached the sea-coast before morning, though the dawning hour was close at hand.

The weather was rough, and a piercing wind blew obliquely from seaward.

The sky was covered over with one huge cloud, which effectually blotted out all traces of the moon and stars.

"What is to be done now, Tom?" asked Jack, with a shiver. "Do you know where you are?"

"I am slightly out in my reckoning, for the darkness has misled me."

"Where are we, then?"

"About a couple of miles from a small fishing village."

"And you think we can there obtain what we want?"

"Oh, there is no doubt about that!"

"How shall we reach it?"

"By making our way along the coast here to the right. The road is tolerably good, and we shall get there in little more than a quarter of an hour."

"Ah!" ejaculated Sixteen-String Jack. "What's that?"

"What—what?"

"Did you not see it?"

"I saw nothing."

"Look—look! There goes another! What is afloat, I wonder?"

As he spoke, Sixteen-String Jack pointed seaward, from which direction two bright lights had shot up, seemingly discharged from a rocket.

Tom King looked intently.

"That's a signal," he said, "and if we wait we shall see the conclusion of it. Ha! there it goes, you see!"

Another ball of fire shot upwards into the darkness, and when it burst and descended in blazing masses the effect was beautiful.

Scarcely had the last of these died away than our friends suddenly caught sight of a light burning steadily on the beach below them.

"See—see," exclaimed Sixteen-String Jack. "What is the meaning of that?"

"The response to the signal."

"You seem to know all about it."

"I have had some experience. But keep still, I want to make out what is going on below."

By slightly changing their position, and by making good use of their powers of vision, our friends were able to distinguish a group of dark, rapidly-flitting figures.

By their motions it could be observed that they were one and all labouring under an excitement of no common character.

"What do you make them out to be?" asked Jack, at length.

"Let us draw a little closer—we shall be able to do so unperceived—and then I can tell better."

There was very little fear indeed that they would be detected, for the roaring of the wind among the cliffs and the rush of the breakers were terrific.

The path was rude and slippery, but it was traversed by the two highwaymen without accident.

Tom paused at a point some height above the level of the beach, and from which he was able to command a good view of all which he wished to take cognizance.

The group of people was now made out to be composed of rough-looking specimens of humanity of both sexes.

Their garments were soaked with the sea spray which dashed continually upon them, and of which they seemed to take no notice at all.

They are smugglers, are they not, Tom?" said Jack, in his companion's ear.

"Yes, there can be no doubt of it."

"And that is some vessel of theirs in the offing?"

"Yes, and on such a night as this it will be no easy task to keep the bark clear of the thousand tooth-like rocks with which these shores are studded. They have need of a good pilot."

"Which they have doubtless got. But you have some object in being thus attentive to their motions?"

"I have."

"What is it?"

"Why, I think these will be the very people to treat with to take us over to France."

"But can we trust them?"

"I should not let them know who we are."

"Yes; but remember how we were served when making a journey from the opposite coast."

"It is not likely that I should ever forget such a time of horror as that."

"And shall you run the risk again?"

"Not blindly."

"What do you mean?"

"Let us continue to watch the movements of these men, and we can afterwards be guided by circumstances."

To this Jack offered no objection.

The proceedings of the people below were not without interest, for they were all anxiously at work, signalling to those on board the bark to escape the rocks of which Tom King had spoken, and which were fearfully disastrous to any ship that might be unfortunate enough to get among their points.

At length the vessel out at sea could be dimly distinguished as a dark, rolling mass upon the surface of the almost as dark waters, which boiled and seethed like some huge cauldron.

As the bark drew nearer the excitement on the beach increased, and the utmost anxiety was manifested to bring her safe to shore.

"Here she comes!" cried Tom King, who had watched the whole of the proceedings with as much breathlessness as if he had been personally concerned in the venture. "Here she comes! Now they have her!"

A grating sound followed as the ship, with one lumbering roll, pitched upon the sand.

"What is the next step, Tom? Mind, I place myself absolutely under your guidance in this matter; for, instead of growing lighter, as it should, it grows darker and darker every instant."

"Still the dawn cannot be far distant. But come, follow me—we will try whether it will not be worth while for them to purchase our silence respecting what we have just seen."

Jack understood this at once, and followed his companion down the rugged path with considerable confidence.

The distance to the spot where the vessel had been run ashore was by no means great; but owing to the inequalities of the ground, it took them some time to reach it.

So intent were the smugglers upon what they were about that it was not until our friends were actually among them that they became aware of their presence.

Immediately there was a cry of startled dismay, and our friends were near paying dearly for their temerity, as a voice cried:

"Spies—foes—foes! Down with them! Sweep them from the earth!"

"Hold!" cried Tom King, in a voice which was heard by all present, and the commanding tone of which instantly compelled every one instinctively to pause. "Hold, I say, and listen! Would you destroy your friends?"

The last word was repeated in incredulous accents by many lips.

"A light here—a light!" said the gruff, stern voice which had before spoken. "A light, I say! Let us see who these intruders and so-called friends may be."

A lantern was immediately produced and handed to a man of so Herculean a build that he seemed to stand at least a head and shoulders taller than his companions.

He came forward, grasping the light, which he held in such a manner as to cast all its beams upon the forms of the two highwaymen.

"Friends, are you?" he said. "Then how is it we do not happen to know you?"

"We mean to be friends," said Tom King, "and we have come here because we wish to secure your services in a little matter, for which we will reward you liberally."

"Well?"

"If you consent—and I give you credit for having too much good sense to refuse—I say, if you consent, we will both remain profoundly silent regarding all we have seen to-night, and lend you a hand to stow your goods away safely as well."

The smuggler captain paused, and looked intently upon our friends.

But they bore the scrutiny without flinching.

"You are no ordinary men," he said, at length; "and what is more, I don't believe you are traitors."

"We will give you leave to shoot us down like dogs if you see us show the least symptom of playing you false," said Tom King, with a bold, undaunted air.

"Give us your hands," said the captain. "We are short of men to-night, and badly want assistance to secure our goods. The weather is against us, and we have certain knowledge that a revenue cutter has been on the watch all night. I made sure at first that you belonged to them."

The smuggler captain did not trouble himself then to inquire any further about the service required of him, but at once set the highwaymen to work.

Our friends laboured with a will, and as soon as ever the remainder of the crew saw them at work, their apprehensions of betrayal vanished, for their unexpected assistants were now participators in their unlawful act.

By the manner in which the smuggler issued his commands, and the promptitude and accuracy with which they were obeyed, our friends easily came to the conclusion that they had all been for a considerable space of time engaged in this species of traffic.

In rather less than an hour the stranded vessel was completely relieved of her cargo, which was piled up upon the beach.

As soon as the last package had been delivered, there was an immediate commotion.

The cause of this soon manifested itself.

They were all most anxious to take advantage of the fast receding tide.

It was important that the lugger, for such the vessel was, should be got afloat, or else the locality of their secret store would be guessed at.

But the danger was imminent that, in spite of their efforts, the vessel would be left high and dry upon the beach, in which the keel had deeply imbedded itself, in consequence of the violence with which it had been driven ashore.

But this clearly was no fresh task.

Tom was afraid the attempt would be a failure; but all at once, with a rush, the lugger was fairly sent into the sea, where for a moment it rolled and tossed tremendously

But the commander was skilful, and soon had his somewhat clumsy bark fairly under weigh.

The departure of the lugger was watched with much interest for some moments, and then all hands were set to work to remove the cargo.

It was while they were all thus engaged that a heavy booming sound came floating over the water, reaching the ears of every one, in spite of the tumult of the elements.

"Ten thousand curses!" said the smuggler captain. "That is the cutter! Quick—quick, my lads! Work now if you never worked before! It will be daylight directly, and there must not be a sign left to show that the run has been made here."

At this moment there was a flash of light to seaward, almost instantly followed by a dull report.

"They are calling to her to lay to," said the smuggler chief. "It does not concern us now. Attend only to the task that lies before you."

The men responded well, and by their united aid the packages and casks—for the cargo had consisted of both—were rolled to a small cavern in the cliffs, the entrance to which was so small, dark, and unpromising, that no one would have thought human beings would penetrate it.

Hitherto, the two highwaymen had not passed beneath this gloomy archway, the labour in which they had been engaged being that of carrying the packages across the beach.

This being at last completed, the captain said:

"Enter—enter. Fear not. The way is smooth enough, if you follow the rest."

"But our horses," said Tom King—"how shall we dispose of them? If we leave them where they now are, will they not be the means of directing special attention to this spot?"

"You are right," said the captain; and then he paused as if reflecting deeply.

"Will you trust me?" he said at length.

"Certainly."

"Then leave the horses to my care. I will be answerable for them."

"But we might need them upon some sudden emergency."

"If you do, I will undertake that they shall be close at hand. Will you be content with that assurance, for I cannot disclose all our secrets to a stranger"

"Give us a moment to confer."

"Be quick, then. It is beginning to grow light, and it is most important that not a single being shall be seen about this spot."

Tom King drew his companion on one side.

"Do you feel inclined to trust this man?"

"Do you?"

"Frankly, then, I say yes. His gang and himself are to some extent in our power."

"But where will he take our horses?"

"Why, in all probability there is some other mode of entering their cavern at a point further inland, and this is where they will be taken."

"Ask him the question, and if he answers in the affirmative we will enter with him."

Tom did so at once.

"You have guessed rightly," answered the captain, in a subdued voice, as though he was anxious that what he said should not be overheard by his crew. "That is what I intended, though I cannot let you know where that other entrance is."

"We will trust you," said Tom King; "and we hope that will go a long way towards convincing you of our good faith."

The captain nodded his head, and urged them to enter.

He had little doubt of their sincerity, and with an amount of discernment for which he deserved due credit, he fancied the service he was required to do was one that would yield him a good pecuniary profit, although it might involve considerable personal danger.

Without hesitation, our two friends crept under the archway after the captain.

The darkness was profound.

For some distance they were compelled to proceed in a crouching position, but all at once they heard the captain say:

"Rise to your feet now and walk forward boldly. The path is clear."

It was no very easy or comfortable thing to walk along through pitch-like darkness, even after such an assurance as this.

The highwaymen were soon aided by a dim, twinkling light, on which they fixed their eyes.

Gradually this increased in size and brightness, until they found that it proceeded from an irregular opening in the rock.

Through this could be seen the interior of an extensive cavern.

Upon entering, our friends looked about them with great interest.

The only light there was came from a huge fire, which was burning brilliantly on the rocky floor of the cave.

The whole of the crew was engaged in stowing away the various articles they had brought to shore.

After the issue of a few necessary commands the captain invited our friends to a seat at a rude table near the fire, on which he had caused a bottle and glasses to be placed.

"Come," he said, "we will have one glass of eau de vie together, to drive the cold off our stomachs, and after that business, for I am very curious to learn the nature of the service you require me to perform. That's good, isn't it?" he added, after the glasses had been emptied.

"Capital!" answered the highwaymen, with tears in their eyes.

"The strongest brandy you ever tasted, is it not?"

"It is indeed."

[THE CAPTURE AT STONEHENGE.]

"Ah, there has been no doctor at work at that, making it palatable. But now, then, come—keep me no longer in suspense."

"What we want, then," said Tom King, "is the use of a boat, to convey a party of, let me see—yes, eight persons in all."

"And what else?"

"Nothing, except a few things we shall have with us; and a horse or two, perhaps."

"You would want the lugger?"

"Yes, and the crew as well."

"And where is your destination?"

"The coast of France."

"I thought so," said the captain, with a significant nod.

"The greatest secrecy will be required," continued Tom; "And if you are faithful, you will find it about as good a night's work as you have ever done."

"What will you give to have the service faithfully performed, and without the asking of more questions than you may choose to answer?"

"How much do you want?"

"Nay, how much will you give?"

"A hundred guineas."

"Make it two hundred, and it's a bargain. I would take you then, no matter who you might be, or who was after you."

"Right—agreed! Though," Tom added, "please to understand that I do not apprehend a pursuit."

"Then I make the bargain. And now about the time—when?"

"That I cannot fix precisely; but certainly not for a fortnight to come."

"Good! But yet, let me have timely notice."

"I will, never fear. And now there is one thing more."

"Speak."

"We are to rejoin our friends not far distant from here; but they will not arrive at present. Now, should we require it, would you give us shelter here till then?"

"Most certainly. You are heartily welcome to make free with whatever the cave holds, for you did us good service by your aid to-night. If the rest had worked like you we should have finished an hour earlier. But no matter, all's well, and so there ought to be no grumbling."

So saying, the captain rose; and, having again impressed upon our friends that they were welcome, he moved off to superintend the movements of his crew.

"This has been easily managed," said Sixteen-String Jack. "And now all I wish is that Dick and the rest will speedily make their appearance, for I cannot help feeling that the sooner we are off the better."

"All in good time, Jack," was the reply. "We ought to be well satisfied with what we have done so far."

"I am—I am. But yet I feel a dreadful presentiment of coming ill."

"Dismiss it," said Tom. "It is caused by the thought that you are about to say farewell to adventures for awhile."

"I was never less in the humour for them in my life," answered Jack, in a tone of so much despondency that his comrade was quite surprised at it. "My heart is heavy, Tom, and I am heartily glad that you asked for and obtained permission from the captain for us to remain here."

"Nonsense," said Tom—"you will soon get over this."

But Sixteen-String Jack only shook his head.

CHAPTER MLX.

THE MEETING AT STONEHENGE.—THE CATASTROPHE.

THE hour was shortly after sunsent, and the time about three weeks after the completion of the compact with the smuggler captain, as related in the last chapter, that three rather weary-looking travellers emerged from a small coppice, and cautiously looked around them.

The view which they obtained from the spot whereon they stood was an extensive one, and long and earnest was the scrutiny bestowed on every object in the landscape.

"The coast seems quite clear, captain," said one of the travellers, at length.

"Yes, I think we can safely say all is well so far," was the reply. "Come, Maud, cheer up—we are close now to our destination."

Maud smiled faintly as she looked up into Dick Turpin's face.

There seemed to be traces of tears clinging to her long eyelashes, and her face looked pale and worn, as though the journey had told much upon her.

Dick witnessed the alteration, and sighed.

His heart reproached him strongly.

Her recollected what Maud had been until her unfortunate connection with himself, and he wished mentally for her sake that they had never met.

For his own part, he felt now that he would rather part with his own existence than with her.

Now, too, he could no longer blind himself to the fact that the never-ending fatigue and the ceaseless anxiety of mind inseparable from such a career as his were killing her by inches.

They were not without an effect upon the robust forms of himself and his comrades.

How much more severely, then, must they have been felt by one so delicately brought-up and nurtured as Maud had been?

All this had long been pressing upon Dick's mind, and accounted for the fact of his being in the vicinity of Stonehenge at least a week earlier than he had at first contemplated and intended.

What endeared Maud to Dick most, and made him still more anxious to gain a place of safety, was that throughout all their privations and sufferings no word of complaint had escaped her lips—she had not wounded him by the utterance of one reproach, nor would she have done so, as he knew full well, if she had died while in his companionship.

To be with him was all that she desired; and in order to have this gratification secured to her, she needed not what hardships she was compelled to undergo.

"Cheer up," said Dick again, as soon as he could command his voice sufficiently for utterance, and placing his hand upon hers at the same moment—"cheer up, Maud. Let me once again see something like a look of happiness upon your pale face, for I assure you, on my word, that if we live, and no unforeseen events occur, forty-eight hours more is the longest time we shall be in England."

Maud pressed Dick's hand, for she could not trust herself to speak after receiving such an assurance.

Her throat swelled and ached until the pain was almost beyond endurance.

She shrunk, too, from letting Dick know that the close realisation of that for which she had so long sighed and wished, was not productive of that amount of joyfulness which she had anticipated.

She felt that it was wrong upon her part to give way to such sensations as these, and she thought it would be a poor return to offer to Dick if she admitted that her strongly-expressed wishes were no better than idle whims.

Finding that she did not break the silence, and attributing her reticence to overjoyfulness, he said:

"Come, then, once more forward—a short half-hour will enable us to reach the place of rendezvous."

He gave Black Bess the rein as he pronounced the words, and the next moment they were all speeding to their destination.

No sooner were they beneath the shadow of the Druids' Stones than they heard voices and footsteps.

"Captain—captain," said some one, "is it you?"

"It is, Tom."

"Safe and sound?"

"Quite so."

While speaking, Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack came forward.

They were much rejoiced to find that Dick and his two companions were quite safe, and this very circumstance went far towards dissipating that gloom which had settled upon Jack's spirits.

"Have you seen nothing of Claude?" was Turpin's next question.

"Nothing. But as he is well able to take care of himself, most likely he is all right."

"And you have met with no alarm here, Tom?"

"None whatever; and so far as we are able to tell, our presence in this part of the kingdom is a profound secret."

"So much the better. We have been most careful in all our movements, and I think I can safely say that no one has recognised us."

"I am glad to hear it," answered Tom; "and I hope the rest will furnish us with a similar account, for we have been here some time, and have effected some important arrangements."

Tom King then informed Dick of his meeting with the smugglers, and their undertaking to convey them in safety across the channel.

This communication greatly improved Maud's spirits, and a certain amount of cheerfulness was noticeable in her mien immediately.

"And have you remained all this while in the seclusion and inactivity of the smugglers' cave?"

"We have; but chiefly on Jack's account, who has suffered himself in a most extraordinary degree to be influenced by——"

Here Tom paused, as for the moment he forgot that he had not mentioned to those present his meeting with the old woman who had uttered the strange prophecy.

"By what, Tom? Why do you pause?"

"Because," interrupted Jack, "he does not care to let you know that he encountered an old woman who predicted that—that——"

"What?" asked Dick, impatiently. "Why do you hesitate and look so grave?"

"It is ridiculous for him to do so," said Tom King, interrupting in his turn, and speaking with as much levity as he could call up. "Because he is foolish enough to pay a deep regard to the impotent curses of an angry old woman."

"But what did she say?"

"The most improbable thing in the world, Dick—that which you would never guess if you tried for a month, it is so monstrous."

"I shall not make the attempt, then. But, as my curiosity is strongly excited, perhaps you will tell me without keeping me any longer in suspense."

"I will. She prophesied that my death was at hand, and that I was doomed to die at the hands of my best friend."

"Your best friend?" echoed Dick, in tones which showed how extreme was his surprise

"Yes, such were the words."

"Then that must be——"

"No other than yourself, Dick. Nay, don't regard it. If I live till you, my longest, truest, stanchest friend, deprive me of life, I shall make sure of a long existence; or if the prophecy must be fulfilled, I would sooner take it from your hands than from the hangman's rope. But give us your hand—there, that's it!—and think no more about it!"

Tom King, as he spoke, grasped his old comrade's hand and shook it warmly.

Dick did not speak, but the communication he had just received made a very deep impression upon him.

Whether he would have made any remark upon recovering from the state of surprise into which he had been thrown is uncertain, for just at this moment some one was heard approaching.

Looking out, they saw that it was Claude Duval, who was riding slowly, and apparently in doubt as to what point of the ruins he should direct his course.

In a low voice, Dick called to him. He was afraid to hail him loudly lest there should be some lurker near.

Upon hearing the tones of that well-known voice, Claude rode briskly forward, and the next moment was surrounded and warmly greeted by his expectant friends.

"You are safe and sound, I see," remarked Sixteen-String Jack.

"Yes, all has gone well with me. I have had an odd adventure or two, which I will recount to you when I find an opportunity; and I do not come back empty-handed. Look at this."

Claude, as he spoke, produced from the pockets in his saddle a goodly quantity of valuables, and intimated that the pockets of his own apparel were equally well filled.

"You have been more successful in this respect than the rest of us," said Dick Turpin. "Still, as we have enough for our purpose, we ought to be satisfied. It is my intention to leave here for the coast as soon as Ellen and Mrs. Davis arrive, Tom and Jack having already made arrangements for the transport of ourselves and our horses."

"But why this haste?"

"You shall know in good time," said Sixteen-String Jack. "The matter now is finally settled."

"Well, you will not find that I shall quarrel with your determination, for I am so overcome with fatigue that I feel as though I should like to lie down and go to sleep, and not wake up for a month at least."

Claude's excellent spirits had the effect, to a considerable extent, of banishing the gloom which had been visible upon the countenances of all composing the group.

Nevertheless, he was quick-sighted enough to see there was something amiss, and at once became importunate to know what that something was.

"It is Sixteen-String Jack here, with his odd, superstitious fancies," said Tom King. "You know what he is, so think no more of it."

"Remember the shadow on the wall," said Jack, solemnly.

At the remention of this unaccountable event, all started, and paled slightly—that is, all but Tom King, and probably he would not have been an exception had he not guessed what his comrade was going to say, and prepared himself accordingly.

An ominous silence followed—a silence which Claude Duval was the first to break.

"Why do you recur to that circumstance?" he said.

"Because the remembrance of it ought to teach you not to think too lightly, if anything that happens to be beyond your comprehension," was Jack's answer.

"But why not tell me what it is that has since made such an impression upon you?"

Tom King, thinking the explanation would best come from him, related his adventure with the woman.

In spite of what Jack had said, it was plain that he (Tom) was determined to make light of it, or at any rate, appear to do so.

But in spite of the levity with which he spoke, Claude was considerably affected, and, strange as it may seem, his exuberant spirits subsided from that moment.

This, however, he was pleased to ascribe to the fatigue of which he had previously spoken.

He at once sought out a place of repose.

The accommodation was very limited in this respect, and on the present occasion Claude Duval was even less inclined than usual to be particular.

Thinking of what had just passed kept sleep for a long time from his eyelids, and when at length he closed them in slumber, he was tormented by all manner of distracting visions.

As the reader may be sure, Maud was much affected, and at the first opportunity she had of speaking alone with Dick Turpin, she said:

"Tell me now, and tell me truly, what do you think of this strange occurrence?"

"I would rather not speak at all."

"But at least you will tell me whether you think the prophecy is likely ever to be fulfilled."

"In a word, then, I do not. I should not hesitate to characterise it as the most improbable thing to occur; still, it is not impossible."

"Not impossible?" echoed Maud, in some surprise at his words.

"No. But if Tom loses his life at my hands, it will only be through the occurrence of some most remarkable accident. Rest assured, it is a contingency which I shall ever do my best to be on my guard against; and now let discussion upon this profitless subject have an end; it can lead to no result."

CHAPTER MLXI.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMRADES ARE GLADDENED BY THE APPEARANCE OF ELLEN AND MRS. DAVIS AT STONEHENGE.

Thus admonished, Maud relapsed into silence; but it was not likely she could help her thoughts brooding upon the matter.

One of the strangest things connected with it was the deep effect which the prophecy had upon all who heard it.

One might almost have fancied that it found an answering echo in all their hearts—that without being conscious of so doing, all had expected it.

Tom King was surprised at the manner in which his communication had been received by his companions, and it became very difficult indeed for him to maintain, when alone, that levity which he had not very easily assumed when in their presence.

During the night which ensued nothing occurred worthy of special mention.

To all appearances, they were as much in solitude on Salisbury Plain as they would have been upon some desolate, uninhabited island.

The highwaymen, one and all, congratulated themselves upon having found such isolated quarters.

For form's sake, their usual method of keeping watch was adhered to; but nothing occurred to break in upon the security of their position.

No sound was heard save the low baaing of some distant sheep, which came upon the ear with a melancholy effect; it seemed to make the loneliness of their position more apparent.

The ensuing day was chiefly spent in wandering about the stupendous ruins, which then had not that marred, defaced appearance which they now present.

Sixteen-String Jack had had the prudence to bring with him from the smugglers' cavern a tolerably large supply of such provisions as he could lay his hands upon, with excellent wine in profusion.

On this score they had nothing to trouble them.

As soon as the sun began to decline towards the west, they commenced their look-out for Mrs. Davis and Ellen.

It was unanimously wished that they would speedily make their appearance.

The present seemed so favourable an opportunity of carrying out their design of leaving England, that it seemed a thousand pities not to avail themselves of it; for even at Stonehenge the highwaymen could not count upon remaining long in this state of seclusion.

"Understand me," Dick had said, "if they arrive at anything like an early hour to-night, we will at once bend our course to the sea-shore."

No demur whatever was raised to this proposition, which was looked upon as being fully agreed to.

Without separating much from each other, the highwaymen contrived to post themselves at various points of the ruins in such a manner that they were able to command every approach.

While they remained thus, they could not fail to be made cognisant at an early moment of the approach of those they looked for.

Thus they remained for some time, talking busily with each other; but as the subject was almost exclusively their project for leaving England, their conversation would be tedious to set down.

Night came at length.

The stars, one by one, peeped forth, and at length the moon rose in all her silver majesty.

Her beams, unobstructed by any intervening obstacle, lighted up the open plain around to a great distance, and the hoary stones themselves seemed to catch and reflect a portion of her argentine lustre.

But morning came at length, but without bringing those they wished to see.

Anxious and impatient, they passed the hours for the most part in uneasy slumber.

The perpetual suspense that they endured was hard indeed to bear, but there was no help for it, though this knowledge afforded them but a small amount of consolation.

It was not, indeed, until the third night—when all were sick and weary with long waiting—that their watching was rewarded.

Just at that time when the indistinctness of twilight merges into the obscurity of night Dick Turpin uttered a low sound, which had the effect of causing all the rest to come clustering round him.

"Hush—hush!" he said—"keep back! I think all is well. But still, let us keep, if we can, upon the safe side."

Tom Davis was with great difficulty restrained from rushing forward.

But Claude Duval twined his arms round him and held him fast.

"No—no," he said—"no you don't, Tom! Just keep quiet a bit, will you!"

"But I tell you they are approaching."

"Well, if they are, there can be no harm in waiting a moment or two in order to make sure."

"Sure!" echoed Tom. "Do you think that I could be in any doubt respecting those two forms which are so well known to me? No—no! you may be doubtful, but I am sure—quite sure!"

"It may be so," said Dick; "but still, the general safety requires that you and all the rest remain here in concealment. Who knows?—they may be watched. Be still, I say—your patience will not be put to trial for more than a moment longer."

With eager, expectant eyes, Tom Davis fixed his gaze upon the two dusky forms which could be seen approaching.

Despite the general gloom, it was quite certain that they were females.

One seemed much overcome with weariness, and at every few steps would pause and lean heavily for support upon her companion, whose slight figure seemed but ill adapted to sustain her weight.

For some time they came on in a direct line towards them, as though in no sort of doubt whatever as to their destination.

But as they drew nearer this confidence of demeanour vanished, and irresolution succeeded.

"They will never find us if we do not disclose ourselves," whispered Tom Davis, in an agony of impatience, which made him regardless of what the captain had said.

This seemed only too probable; but Dick was somehow strangely impressed with the idea that there was great necessity for cautiousness.

Apparently there was nothing either visible or audible to account for this feeling.

At length, however, in a low tone of voice, he cried out:

"This way—this way! Ellen—Ellen! Hist! This way!"

A glad cry from the girl's lips let him know that he had been heard, though Dick was much annoyed at the want of caution which this evinced.

The sound reached also the ears of Mrs. Davis, who felt her exhausted strength suddenly return.

In another moment the dark black shadow of the Druid's Stones was reached.

Over the meeting we shall pass in silence, feeling sure that, knowing so much of all the characters as the reader does, it must be easier to imagine than describe it.

As soon as ever the first demonstrations of joy were over, Dick questioned Ellen.

"Have you had an uninterrupted journey hither" he asked.

"Perfectly so."

"You have seen nothing of the officers?—you have no reason to suppose that any of our foes followed you from London?"

"I am almost certain not."

"How almost?"

"As certain as anyone could be who was not actually informed of the fact."

Dick drew a long breath of relief.

"Why, so far, then, all is well," said Tom King.

"Yes," added Sixteen-String Jack; "let us set about leaving at once."

"In good time. I see no reason for immediate haste; I would fain learn how matters stand in London. Doubtless Old Matthew has sent some message. Tell us," he added, turning to Ellen, "did you not meet with Old Matthew as soon as you were liberated?"

"No But we were accosted by some one who said he was a friend of his, and promised to take us to him."

"And did he so?"

"Yes."

"And he found you a shelter?"

"Yes. We are both most grateful to him, and to you who prompted it."

"Never mind that now," interrupted Dick, hastily. "When you left, what did he tell you?"

"That we were to say that the officers were all uncommonly quiet, and that he did not half like it. He could not make out what this change of tactics meant, and felt much troubled concerning it."

"And was that all?"

"All, save that he had a piece of advice to offer you, which he hoped you would have the good sense not only to listen to but follow—those were his exact words," Ellen added.

"And what was this advice?"

"That you should all leave England at the very earliest moment possible, and not return to it for some time."

"Hurrah for Matthew's advice!" said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Hush—hush!"

"What is it?"

"Nothing, only we ought not to be too noisy. Old Matthew's counsel shall not be disregarded even for a moment. I feel that this complete silence on the part of the officers is a bad sign for us, and as soon as you can get your horses ready we will start."

CHAPTER MLXII

ADVERTS TO THE ENERGETIC PROCEEDINGS OF THE POLICE OFFICERS IN LONDON.

In order that the calamitous events which followed the arrival of the highwaymen at Stonehenge may be fully understood, it will be necessary for us to devote a little space to the occurrences which had been taking place in London—to explain, in fact, that extraordinary lull on the part of the officers of justice which, as Old Matthew and Dick Turpin rightly thought, was no good sign.

In the first place, then, we must mention a singular coincidence.

It will be remembered that when Claude imposed so cleverly upon the credulous squire, he stated something which he thought probable enough, but without knowing that such a thing had been done.

He passed himself off as an agent from the chief magistrate at Bow Street, and stated that certain high Government officials had sent an urgent communication respecting the many failures which had been made to capture the highwaymen.

Now, oddly enough, this was exactly what had taken place.

The numerous defeats which the police officers had met with, and the no better success which had attended the plan of patrolling the roads by dragoons, were felt to be a scandal and disgrace to the police officials.

The people at large, ever ready to find fault with the ruling powers, were loud in their complaints, and these complaints at length reached the ears of his Majesty's officers of State—or rather, the outcry became so loud, that they could no longer pretend to be ignorant of it.

Accordingly a particular message, of a private and confidential character, was sent to the chief magistrate at Bow Street respecting the matter in question.

The subject of this communication was, that he must make use of every means he could to capture the highwaymen, either dead or alive; and further added, that if this was not done after the elapsion of a reasonable time, he would be dismissed from office.

This was the most unpalatable and alarming part of the missive, but it was smoothed over by the addition that in the event of early success he might look forward to some lasting and substantial recognition of his services.

This hint was enough.

The magistrate felt he must bestir himself, for already he had remained at his post almost long enough to entitle him to a life pension should he be removed from it from any cause; so that dismissal, in his case, would have been excessively aggravating.

Upon receiving the communication the magistrate resolved to lose no time in taking promptly the strictest steps.

A conversation with his chief clerk resulted in an interview with a very singular individual, who rejoiced in the cognomen of Antrobus Skellum.

This man had led for some time a precarious life in making himself generally useful in police business, and in all that he undertook displayed so much sagacity and cunning that it was supposed he would prove the best agent for the capture of the celebrated highwaymen.

Until this moment the chief magistrate had never troubled himself to notice very particularly the exterior appearance of this man; but now, looking at him, he saw that he was a little under-sized fellow with a very wiry frame, and, probably, having not one ounce of superfluous flesh over his whole body.

His eyes were bright and piercing, and the magistrate, who, from his very occupation, was no bad judge of human nature, felt at once that chance had supplied him with the very agent he required, and that if he failed to accomplish his purpose it would be strange indeed.

Skellum's eyes grew brighter than ever when he learned the cause for which he had been summoned before the magistrate.

"If you will only place power enough at my disposal, and give me a decent sum by way of a reward," he said, "I will undertake the capture of them all before a month from the present date."

"What power do you require?"

"As many police officers as I may judge necessary for my purpose, all of whom must be absolutely under my control, and who are to obey all my instructions faithfully and without demur."

"Granted," said the magistrate. "You shall have them. And now for the reward."

"That, your worship, I leave to you."

"Nay—nay: name your terms, and let the matter be settled now and for all."

Skellum paused for a moment in deep reflection, as though weighing his chances of making a good thing of the business in hand.

The magistrate grew impatient.

"Two guineas a week," said Skellum, at length, "for as long as either of us may live. No matter which dies, the payment ceases."

The magistrate stared, or he had not anticipated that a reward would have been asked for in such a shape as this.

He held a whispered conference with his clerk, and took into account Skellum's age and the probable length of time he would live.

Last of all he thought that his pension depended upon this man's success, and that decided him.

He thought he could well afford to pay such a sum out of the amount to which he would be entitled.

"Agreed!" he said.

But Skellum was particular, and required a written memorandum of the agreement, in order that there might be no dispute in the future.

After some demur this was given, and an authority issued for him to pick out of the whole force such men as he thought would be most likely to perform efficiently the services he required of them.

Skellum began without delay.

To detail the whole of his proceedings would be somewhat tedious.

We shall give, instead, a general outline of his actions.

After much earnest deliberation and the abandonment of many plans which had suggested themselves to his quick-witted intellect, he remembered the fact of Mrs. Davis and Ellen being under sentence.

His next step was to ascertain when the term would expire, and found that he had not long to wait.

He then made a further stipulation, which was, that no active measures should be taken by anyone else in London against the highwaymen but himself.

This was the cause of that cessation of hostilities which had first surprised Old Matthew, and afterwards caused him to experience considerable alarm; for Skellum was so careful that he managed to preserve a complete secrecy as to his intentions.

The success he met with in this respect may be best understood and estimated when we say that Old Matthew was kept in the dark respecting his designs.

There was something, too, quite augurative of success in the calmness and patience with which he waited for the ripening of his plans.

It was suggestive of the manner in which a cat will keep on the watch for prey, with the certainty that if it only waits long enough its object will be achieved.

Thus matters went on until the morning when the prisoners were released from durance.

A trusty agent of Mr. Skellum's was placed on the watch at the outer gate.

He would have performed the service himself, only he feared that if he was seen there the cause of his presence would be suspected.

This man performed his part so well as to escape the notice of the person Old Matthew had sent, in pursuance of his agreement with the highwaymen, to meet the prisoners.

With the vigilance of a fox, Skellum's agent watched every movement made, and finally succeeded in tracking them all to the house which Old Matthew had provided for their reception.

This was done, too, without giving rise to the least alarm.

The house was situated in a small back street, and the spy took lodgings at a house immediately opposite, so as to remain perpetually on the watch.

At dusk he was joined by Skellum, who had been made acquainted with his whereabouts.

"You are sure they do not suspect that they have been watched and followed?"

"Quite sure."

Skellum rubbed his hands gleefully.

"All will be well now," he cried, exultantly. "It is nothing but fair and straightforward sailing now. No more is to be done save to keep a close watch upon the movements of those two females, and we shall come up with the whole gang at last."

The spy himself was sanguine of success, and as he had been offered a very considerable reward, he felt quite a warm interest in the affair.

But when a whole week elapsed without either Ellen or Mrs. Davis having gone abroad, doubts began to intrude themselves upon him.

He mentioned them, but Skellum only laughed.

"I am so sure in my own mind that what I have said will come to pass, that I should have patience enough to remain for a month, or even longer, watching thus.

It was on the very next day after this that something occurred which would have had the effect of strengthening Skellum's convictions had they showed any signs of weakening.

This was that Old Matthew, under cover of the darkness, one night paid them a visit.

Our jovial friend had waited as he thought a sufficient time; and being, as we have said, in entire ignorance with regard to Mr. Skellum and his doings, conceived that he had waited long enough to make it safe for him to pay a visit.

"Keep good watch now," said Skellum, as soon as he was informed of this event—"keep good watch; for, rely upon it, the time is close at hand when the birds will take their flight, and we must be prepared to follow them with all secrecy."

This made the spy more watchful still, for he had the very highest opinion of Skellum's abilities.

But another week elapsed, and then Old Matthew paid another visit.

This was the period at which he told them that it was time for them to start, and gave them such information as would enable them to reach their destination

The quiescence of the officers made him more and more uneasy, and occasioned him to send that message to Dick Turpin which the reader has already heard Ellen deliver.

He was most particular in enjoining secrecy; but, alas! how needlessly—all their efforts were of no avail, and he himself did not believe that the police officers were watching the premises.

Matthew himself provided them with funds for their journey, which, however, he recommended they should make on foot, as they had plenty of time before them, and by this means it would be more difficult to trace them.

Old Matthew then bade them farewell, and took his departure.

Skellum was now on the alert in good earnest.

He took every precaution which astuteness and an anxious desire of success could suggest.

Then he waited, and on the following night, happening to be at his spy's lodgings, he was rewarded by seeing the pair come forth.

With the same skill as before, Ellen and Mrs. Davis were followed; but though both turned continually and looked anxiously behind them, they had not the least suspicion that foes were on their track.

And thus they commenced their long and tedious journey.

In one respect, however, Skellum, with all his adroitness, was at fault.

When he saw them set out on foot, he had jumped to the conclusion that they had not far to journey.

He was not long in discovering his mistake, and wished he could hit upon some means of discovering their destination.

This he was compelled to abandon as impossible, for he gave them both credit for possessing sufficient good sense to preserve this a complete secret.

He again summoned patience to his aid, and of this commodity he possessed a tolerably good stock.

But he continued to lay his plans.

He strengthened his force, and sent to the chief magistrate accounts in which he expressed himself more sanguine than ever of success.

One person alone followed the fugitives, and as he went along he continued to leave accounts of his progress, so that the officers Skellum commanded had no difficulty in keeping in his footsteps, nor was there any necessity for the observance of secrecy on their part.

When he had gone far enough to form an idea of their course, he guessed their destination to be some point on the south-western coast.

"We shall have a good haul," he said, triumphantly, to himself—"we shall nail them just as they are about to make their escape from England. Ha! ha! my annuity is as good as secure now; and, upon my word, I believe that I have earned it."

In this comfortable state of mind he continued the journey, though the slow progress they were compelled to make was excessively tiresome and trying to the patience of the men.

Whenever he fancied he discovered any symptom of disaffection he painted, in glowing colours, the certainty there was that they would achieve success if they continued to remain true to his instructions.

He was afraid to remain far behind in the rear of his spy, for of course he could not tell how soon the fugitives might join the highwaymen, and he was desirous of pouncing upon them at unawares.

Thus matters went on, with little to vary the monotony which characterised them, except that each day their progress became slower and slower.

Mrs. Davis was excessively feeble, and Ellen by no means strong.

The reader will easily believe this when he remembers how much both had latterly gone through.

At last, however, Salisbury Plain was gained, and the knowledge that they were so near the appointed meeting-place reanimated the failing strength of both.

But the open character of the ground now made it most difficult for the spy to perform his duty unseen.

Still, by various stratagems, he continued to keep his prey in sight, until he beheld them enter Stonehenge.

Then he paused, and finally retraced his steps to a little distance.

Here he waited for the arrival of the troop.

"Ha," said Skellum, in whom this intelligence had produced an excellent flow of spirits, "now I have it! This will prove the meeting-place for all the gang, which I know to have been dispersed! If we are careful we shall have them all at one swoop!"

Skellum was amply provided with men, and he set about taking his measures with great rapidity and prudence.

He seemed to grasp at the capabilities of the place at once.

He was most particular to enjoin stealthfulness on the part of his men, who were able to make their way over the soft turf almost unheard.

Having first of all seen them posted round the ruins in a circle, with the men at such distances that they could communicate readily with each other, he proceeded to visit them one by one, and ascertain that their weapons were in perfect order.

He also gave them their instructions one after the other, so that there should be no fear of a misunderstanding.

The course he had decided upon to capture our friends was fearfully well calculated to answer the end in view.

Having placed his men round the ruins as we have described, he told them to be in readiness to advance slowly and steadily, and, as near as possible, all at the same rate of speed.

The consequence of this was that as they thus advanced the circle became less and less, and by consequence the men got closer to each other, until they were ere long shoulder to shoulder.

So silently had all their movements up to this moment taken place that the highwaymen were entirely unaware of their proximity.

The police officers listened.

They heard sounds which convinced them that those they sought were close at hand.

"Now a sudden rush," said Skellum, "and the business will be done—we shall be upon them before they know what is the matter! Be, every one of you, ready to make the best use of your powers during the next few moments! All is ready! Forward—forward! Down with them all! Remember, dead or alive! In either case the reward is just the same! Forward—forward!"

CHAPTER MLXIII.

THE RESULT OF THE POLICE OFFICERS' ATTACK UPON DICK TURPIN AND HIS FRIENDS AT STONEHENGE.

THE reader now will have no difficulty in thoroughly comprehending the tremendous nature of the peril with which the highwaymen and their friends were threatened.

So well generaled had the police officers been that they were all in utter ignorance of their proximity.

One or two causes conspired to produce this result.

In the first place there was the general excitement which took place on the arrival of Ellen and Mrs. Davis, and during which they had omitted to make use of their customary caution.

A gusty wind, too, had blown up, which every moment increased in intensity, and the odd whistling sound which it made in searching a passage through the crevices of the old stones was sufficient to submerge any slight occasional sound.

Moreover, this wind had brought with it some dense masses of black cloud, which went driving across the heavens, threatening every moment to discharge a torrent of rain upon the earth below.

The elements, therefore, went very far to favour the officers.

It was, however, just before the police officers made their onslaught, that Dick Turpin uttered those words which will be found at the close of a preceding chapter.

As there was a unanimous desire to quit the ruins, preparations were instantly commenced for a departure.

Tom Davis, Claude, Jack, and Tom King started off to fetch the horses; and this was the time that they first became aware of their peril.

"Danger—danger!" cried Tom King, at the top of his voice, and preparing himself for an immediate defence. "The foe is upon us! The ruins are alive with officers!"

The concluding words had scarcely passed his lips before the whole troop rushed into the small open space where the conference of our friends had taken place.

Some remained mounted, while others were on foot, so as to be in readiness to attack in every way.

So suddenly did this irruption of the officers take place—so utterly unexpected was any such event, that our friends were completely paralysed by surprise.

Even Dick Turpin, accustomed as he was to sudden surprises of every description, stood as though he had been suddenly converted into stone.

True to the bloodthirsty hint which had been given them, the officers discharged their pistols; but they were too hasty and too excited for the volley to produce as much harm as one would have anticipated from it.

After this all was confusion.

Had there been a disinterested spectator of the scene, he would have been conscious of nothing save the clash of weapons, loud yells, groans, and cries, and the discharge of firearms.

Mingled with all this could be heard the trampling of horses, the rushing of many feet, and general uproar and confusion, while the gloom which prevailed was trebly increased by the smoke from the exploded weapons, which hovered over the combatants like a mimic crowd.

Dick Turpin's surprise, however, lasted only until the first pistol shot fell upon his ear.

That well-known and familiar sound brought him to himself.

In the twinkling of an eye he was ready for action.

But, to his dismay and horror, a wild and awful shriek thrilled from the lips of Maud; and after a frantic effort to save herself by grasping at Dick's apparel, she fell heavily to the ground.

Such an event as this was sure to have one of two effects upon Turpin.

It would either render him motionless or helpless, or else endue him with the rage and vigour of a dozen men.

Fortunately, it was the latter effect which was produced upon him.

In fact, it may be questioned whether he instantly comprehended to the full extent what had happened.

Be it how it may, he bestrode Maud's prostrate body, and, levelling the two pistols which he held full at the forms of the officers who were in the act of rushing upon him, discharged them.

Both bullets told, for, despite his tremendous agitation, Dick's nerves were steady.

Without pausing, he flung the two useless weapons at his foes with the full strength of his arms.

His next act was to stoop and raise Maud.

Supernatural strength seemed to be afforded him, for he lifted her up with as much ease and swiftness as he could have done a little child.

Then, having nothing before him but Maud's peril he made a rush to escape.

But it was scarcely possible he could succeed in getting clear of so many foes.

But fortune favoured him.

Close beside him was his own gallant mare, Black Bess, standing calm and unhurt amid the tumult.

Never had she rendered her owner a greater or more highly-prized service than by being at hand at that juncture.

The rapidity which characterised all Dick's movements now was something marvellous.

In a second, with a continuation of the preternatural strength with which he had been endowed, he placed Maud across the back of Black Bess, and sprang into the saddle behind her himself.

But rapid as he had been, yet the time had been sufficient to enable his foes to be busy; and just when he had accomplished thus much, our hero found his further progress opposed.

But he was then more like a madman than a sane being, and bent only on one thing—namely, a frenzied desire to escape.

He drew his sword, and flashed it round him with so much vigour and with such lightning-like rapidity, that his foes scattered before him like chaff, and shrunk from him as from a demon.

"On, Bess!" he cried. "On—on, old lass! If ever you strove for your master, strive now!"

Black Bess seemed not only to hear his voice, but also to comprehend the purport of the very words her rider uttered.

She reared and plunged as though driven to madness.

Turpin's foes shrank from her iron-bound hoofs.

But the struggle was only for a space of time so brief that we are unable to find a word to characterise it, though to Dick it seemed an age.

With one bound Bess cleared herself from the police officers—another took her beyond the precincts of the ruins.

Never before had she taken such furious leaps.

Nothing could withstand them.

Away—away she flew.

Shots were fired from the rear, but Dick heeded them not.

Other officers spurred their steeds unmercifully—steeds which had been expressly chosen by Skellum for their more than ordinary powers of swiftness and endurance.

On they came, till the earth seemed to shake and resound beneath the furious beat of the iron hoofs.

But of this also Dick was supremely heedless.

He laughed to scorn their puny efforts, for Black Bess was bounding over Salisbury Plain with the swiftness of an antelope which finds itself hard pressed by the huntsmen.

As though utterly unconscious of the double burden which she carried, she kept up that long stretching gallop for which she was so remarkable.

Away—away, until in the distance can be seen the boundary of the huge plain they are traversing with such rapid flight, and until the police officers are far behind.

But yet the gallant animal relaxed not her speed, seeming rather to possess some portion of the frenzy with which her rider's heart and brain were filled.

But we must leave them thus for awhile, and return to the scene of action, where much had taken place to which attention must be given.

We shall have to treat of these occurrences successively; but of course the reader will understand that this is compulsory, though the events themselves occurred simultaneously.

When they made their first sudden dash, the police officers succeeded in seizing four persons, or rather five, for they grasped Claude, but he, by a rapid, ready movement, and by a powerful exertion of his enormous strength, contrived to get free and stand upon the defensive.

The other four were not so fortunate.

These were Tom Davis, his wife, Ellen, and Sixteen-String Jack respectively.

The three first made very little, if any, resistance, and were immediately dragged away, Tom Davis himself having received a pistol shot.

As for Sixteen-String Jack himself, he was thrown into a complete state of paralysis, caused by intense surprise.

Nothing could possibly have astonished him more than for the officers thus to spring upon them, and for some moments he was literally bereft of motion.

He only stood and stared around him, and, indeed, exhibited all those signs of semi-consciousness which sometimes follow a heavy blow.

He could scarcely believe that his eyes were serving him aright.

When he recovered himself from this state of mental stupor, which in reality had not lasted half so long as he had imagined, he found himself standing calmly with a police officer on each side of him, the vice-like character of whose grasp was far from pleasant.

The officers we in no slight degree amazed by the apathy of their prisoner.

His demeanour was so different to what they had expected that they scarcely knew what to make of it.

The instant he recovered himself, Jack made a sudden effort to release himself.

But it was in vain.

He discovered, first of all, that his wrists had been securely handcuffed behind his back, which made anything like an effectual struggle out of the question.

A dull sensation of aching pain somewhere in the neighbourhood of his ankle joint made him sensible that he had been injured in that quarter.

By the pain, he fancied it must be from a pistol bullet.

Both the officers by whom he was held had their drawn swords in their right hands, and they at once presented their points menacingly at the breast of their prisoner, while they said, in tones which admitted no doubt of their sincerity:

"If you offer any resistance we will make short of the matter by plunging these swords into your heart, for our orders are to take you dead or alive—it matters not which!"

Upon hearing these words, Jack gave himself up for lost.

At any rate, it would have been a mere act of suicide to have offered any further resistance then.

"I surrender," he said calmly. "I cannot help myself."

"Spoken like a sensible man, who knows how to give in handsomely when he is beaten."

To this maxim the highwayman made no comment.

His brow was contracted, and his breath came thick and fast as he gazed upon the scene of carnage going on before him.

But it is to be hoped that this resignation to his fate was seeming only, and that the expression of his unconditional surrender was only made in the hope that his captors might be to some extent thrown off their guard by it, and so afford him a chance of making a rush for freedom.

But in good earnest, Sixteen-String Jack's heart was very, very heavy.

For a long time he had been dimly conscious of what was going to happen, and this had manifested itself in the strong desire which he had shown to leave England with all haste.

Now this disastrous attack seemed to have crushed him utterly, and he hung his chin upon his breast with an air of dejection that was painful indeed to witness.

But aid was near, although he knew it not.

Tom King and Claude Duval had been the most self-possessed of the whole group, and had been the first to make a decided stand against the multitude of foes who pounced upon them.

Back to back they placed themselves, overcoming all opposition, and escaping by a miracle any serious injury from that storm of bullets that hailed around them, though several slight injuries had been received by both

It was in vain—nay, it was madness for them to combat with so many.

But they had the satisfaction of witnessing Dick's escape, and they both hoped that Maud's hurt was not a severe one.

The real object of their attention was Sixteen-String Jack.

Towards him they fought their way

They wondered much to see him standing still so quietly, and still more that he had suffered himself to be made prisoner so easily.

Their intention was to rescue him.

No sooner did Jack see them, and guess their intention, than he cried, in a loud voice:

"Desist--desist! Your attempt is madness! Leave me!"

"Never!" said Claude; and as he pronounced the word, he cut down the officer who had opposed himself to him.

"I tell you it is more than madness!" vociferated Sixteen-String Jack, in return. "You cannot contend successfully with so many; you must be defeated! Leave me—you cannot help me!"

"Never!" cried Tom King, fighting desperately.

"Then you are giving yourselves up and doing me no service. If you escape and join the captain, all will be well."

"Never, without you, Jack!"

"But do you not understand," cried Jack, almost frantic, "that while you are at liberty you have the chance of assisting me? If you are captured or slain you will require assistance yourselves; and where will you get it? Not another word, I say! Fly—fly!"

"Jack is right," said Tom King, in a tone of vexation. "We can help him best by deserting him."

"A bold charge, then!" cried Claude. On—on! We must have our horses!"

But the officers, now under the generalship of Skellum, had formed themselves into a collected force.

They were prepared to bear down upon the remainder of the band.

But Claude and Tom both felt that they were fighting not only for themselves, but for their companions, and this knowledge impelled them to enact prodigies of valour.

As the last words were pronounced they made a sudden dash and managed to get clear of those of their foes who immediately surrounded them.

Then, summoning up all their powers of speed, they dashed among the ruins, the intricacies of which enabled them to baffle their enemies considerably.

Before them were some horses belonging to those police officers who had dismounted.

Panting and breathless, the two friends reached them.

They flung away their swords, for the weapons now would only have been an incumbrance.

Then, amid another shower of bullets, they sprang into the saddles.

"Away—away!" said Tom King, faintly. "We must part, and that will distract them. Away—away!"

The last word was scarcely audible, for Tom had been badly hit by one of the bullets in the last discharge of firearms.

CHAPTER MLXIV.

DESCRIBES THE PRECAUTIONS SKELLUM TOOK TO CONVEY HIS PRISONERS IN SAFETY TO NEWGATE.

We feel it necessary to remind the reader that all which we have described at such length actually occurred in an extraordinarily brief space of time.

So brief, indeed—so rapid had been all the varied events, that from the moment when the officers first dashed in up to the time when Claude and Tom King got away, certainly not more than three minutes had elapsed.

To those we have just mentioned the lapse of time by no means appeared to be so great.

The whole seemed to them like an electric shock.

As the whole party of the highwaymen and their friends had been thus suddenly separated, it will be necessary for us to describe sequentially what befel them.

Assuming, then, that for the present at any rate, Sixteen-String Jack's position to be the most critical, we will first of all give our consideration to him.

When he saw Claude and Tom also succeed in liberating themselves, he was overcome with joy.

Despite the terrible nature of his situation, he by no means looked upon it with the same sensations as he had done a moment or so previously.

He was quite certain that no effort upon their part would be wanting to set him once again at liberty.

This conviction caused him to resign himself still more calmly into the hands of his captors.

Skellum, however, was furious at the slight amount of success he had met with.

[DICK TURPIN AT MAUD'S DEATH-BED.]

He could not understand it.

Still, one would have thought that he might have experienced some amount of contentment and satisfaction at having made four prisoners, one of whom was no other than the notorious Sixteen-String Jack, who had hitherto so skilfully contrived to elude capture.

For all that, though, Mr. Skellum was bitterly disappointed.

He had made sure of capturing the whole of the band, and now his chances of doing so seemed somewhat doubtful.

Like a prudent and sensible man, however, he elected to remain and take great care of those prisoners he had made, and left to his subordinates the task of keeping up the pursuit.

It was not long before, owing to the darkness of the evening, both pursuers and pursued were quickly lost to sight.

When this was the case he turned round to address those of the men who remained with him, and whose numbers anyone would have thought were more than sufficient to prevent any possibility of escape or rescue.

"Now, then," he cried, in savage tones, "look to all being made right and secure, and without any more delay we will turn our faces Londonward.

He drew near to Sixteen-String Jack as he spoke, for of course he was his most important prisoner.

"It shall be a short shrift for you, my buck!" he said to Jack, glaring at him horribly with his squinting eyes. "You may think that you will give me the slip as you have done others who have had you in custody; but if you do," he added, with a horrible imprecation, "I'll forgive you!"

There was something about this man's manner more revengeful and malevolent than Jack had ever experienced.

No. 231 will be Published next Monday.

But he affected to take no notice of what had just been said, behaving as though he thought the words had been addressed to anyone rather than himself.

This, as he quite anticipated, made Skellum more savage than ever.

But just at this moment an officer came behind him and touched him on the shoulder.

Skellum turned round quickly.

"Well, what is it?" he said, sharply.

"Beg pardon, sir, but——"

"Come, out with it!"

"I wanted to know whether you had decided on any particular plan for carrying your prisoners to London?"

Skellum remained silent.

In good truth he had not once thought of what had just been mentioned, though he did not care about acknowledging so much to his subordinate.

Nevertheless, in a subdued tone, he asked:

"Am I wrong in thinking, Jenkins, that you have some particular plan to propose?"

"Well, sir, I——"

"Have you not thought of something which you deem will be worthy of being put in practice? If so, speak—don't be afraid."

"Well, Mr. Skellum, I had been thinking that as two of our prisoners happened to be women it would be necessary to find out some way of taking them safely."

"Very good; and how do you propose to do it?"

"Why, you must remember that there is a farm-house not very many miles from here."

Well?"

"I thought if we went there we might be able to borrow some kind of a covered vehicle in which we could place them all, and to which we could harness six or eight horses. We should be able to keep good guard round, and prevent anyone from getting out of it; and it strikes me that the prisoners would be carried to London much sooner."

Mr. Skellum paused to consider.

"Yours is not a very bad plan, and something of the sort must be adopted."

"Yes, sir."

"But I can propose an amendment which I believe will be an improvement."

The officer looked expectant.

"It can't be many miles to Salisbury, can it?"

"It can't; though I don't justly know how far it may be."

"Well, we will, in the first place, make our way there, and, having arrived, we'll engage the stage-coach."

"Engage the stage-coach!" echoed the officer, in some surprise.

"Yes, we can easily do so. That, you will see, is a much better vehicle for rapid travelling than anything on wheels that we could hope to find at a farm-house."

"Besides, the whole of you could take it in turns to ride on and in the coach along with the prisoners, which would rest you from the fatigues of riding continually."

"Very true, sir, so it would."

"Then let it be done. We can continue to keep the prisoners secure until then."

"And I suppose you would wish some one sent on to Salisbury to make the necessary arrangements?"

"Yes; and now I think of it, that service cannot be performed better by anyone than yourself."

The officer bowed low to this compliment, as he said:

"Then, with your permission, Mr. Skellum, I will start at once."

"Yes, yes—the sooner the better. I will see to the rest."

The officer departed, mounted his horse, and was soon galloping to his destination.

Although this dialogue had taken place within a few paces of where Sixteen-String Jack stood, yet the speakers had been careful to carry it on in a tone so low that he was unable to overhear many consecutive words of it.

He was not able to catch sufficient to enable him to comprehend their intentions.

A scene of considerable animation now ensued.

Without any exception, the police officers were most solicitous to preserve the prisoners they had made, and turned all their attention to this end.

By the special direction of Skellum, Sixteen-String Jack was accommodated with several yards of strong rope, which the officers had brought with them for the purpose of securing their prisoners.

This was bound round him in many directions, and knotted everywhere with so much tightness that it was only by enduring much pain that he managed to move even a single limb.

Tom Davis was also strongly bound, he being considered a most desperate character.

As for Mrs. Davis, her state of bodily feebleness was too extreme for any fears to be apprehended on her account. Still, in spite of the remonstrance of Ellen and Sixteen-String Jack, her hands were tightly tied behind her.

Ellen herself was even more carefully secured.

The whole were then mounted, and at an easy rate the whole procession started for Salisbury.

Little occurred upon the route, for the darkness was great and the loneliness extreme.

Sixteen-String Jack strove to pierce the gloom, and listened for any sound which might betoken the contiguity of his comrades, but in vain.

Bound as he was, and so closely surrounded by resolute, well-armed men, whose sole care was to look sharp after him, of course Sixteen-String Jack had no chance—nay, not even the ghost of a chance—of making his escape.

Owing to the difficulties with which they were beset, it was not until day had fairly begun that they rode into the ancient city of Salisbury.

The intelligence of their anticipated arrival had been noised abroad, for the officer had made no secret of the matter.

The consequence was that a large concourse of people were assembled outside the city, all of whom were filled with curiosity to see the notorious highwayman.

When Jack first caught sight of them his spirits rose, for the thought occurred to him that their presence might be owing to the exertions of his associates.

But a moment's reflection, as well as the demeanour of the vast multitude, convinced him of his error.

But he determined not to allow any trace of his vexation to be manifest; and so, although it cost him a great effort, he held up his head and looked calmly around him.

All the way to the inn at which the stage-coach was standing the way was lined with people, crushing, crowding, and jostling with each other, and only kept clear of the advancing cavalcade with much difficulty.

At length, however, the inn was reached in safety.

It now became necessary for the police officers to arrange themselves in a semicircle in order to keep off the people.

A little delay now took place, for the wants of the horses were attended to, and the officers themselves refreshed, for they were all hungry and thirsty.

Refreshments were offered also to all the prisoners, who, however, declined to receive anything.

Mr. Skellum's impatience to reach London was too great to allow any unnecessary lingering, and ere long all was in readiness for a start.

One of the best horses was then picked out, and an officer selected to ride him.

This man was to gallop on in advance, and give notice of their coming, making arrangements for frequent relays of horses, so that no unnecessary delay might take place.

Sixteen-String Jack was then lifted into the stage-coach, for his bonds were of such a character as to render him incapable of entering by himself.

His three fellow-prisoners were then pushed in after him, and two police-officers followed.

Both were strong, resolute, well-armed men, and were seated at the opposite doors, so as to give an immediate alarm in case of any movement on the part of the prisoners.

Other officers would have entered had there been room, but the interior of the stage-coach was only constructed to carry six passengers

The doors were then secured by means of chains and padlocks, and as many well-armed police officers as could be accommodated then took seats upon the roof.

Thus freighted, the stage-coach moved off amidst the tumultuous cries of the assembled people.

Mr. Skellum himself sat next to the driver, and his queer-looking little figure and unprepossessing countenance called forth abundance of remark.

No less than six horses were harnessed to the coach, and as they were all of the best quality there could be little doubt but that they would be able to make good speed upon their journey.

The remainder of the police, mounted upon their horses, formed a kind of guard or escort round the stage-coach, which they were careful to surround completely.

It was in this fashion that Sixteen-String Jack quitted the good city of Salisbury and began his journey towards London.

Such skilful arrangements as these were well calculated to prevent all possibility of the occurrence of any escape whatever, either through the astuteness of the prisoners themselves or through any attack which might be made upon them by their friends in the course of the journey they were about to take.

That such precautions were not unnecessary the reader must be aware, since nothing was more likely than that Sixteen-String Jack's companions would attempt to rescue him.

But Jack's own heart sank within him when he witnessed the preparations made for his safe detention, and a deeper gloom than ever settled upon his spirits.

As for Tom Davis, he did nothing but reproach himself over and over again, for he persisted in attributing the calamity which had occurred to his presence among the highwaymen.

"But for me," he groaned out repeatedly, "this would never have happened. Oh, that I should live to see such a day as this!"

"You might have expected that it would come sooner or later, Tom. Let us hear no more of your reproaches, they are unjust."

But Davis would not listen to this.

As for Mrs. Davis, she was too much overcome, both bodily and mentally, to be able to take cognisance of what was being said. She seemed, indeed, to be unconscious of everything that was going on around her.

No tears filled her eyes—no sobs broke from her breast. She sat stony cold and apathetic, exhibiting that form of intense grief which is most painful to look upon.

As for Ellen, she wept incessantly.

These tears would not allow her to speak, but her self-reproaches were none the less audible to herself.

She felt strongly, although no one had dropped a hint to that effect, that she, and she alone, was to blame for what had happened.

It was as clear to her as noonday that the police officers had followed in her footsteps in consequence of not taking sufficient precautions for secrecy, although the necessity of doing so had been so strongly impressed upon her by Old Matthew.

She could not help thinking of all this, and yet she felt that if she continued to do so the harrowing nature of her reflections would drive her mad.

She expected that Sixteen-String Jack would overwhelm her with the bitterest reproaches for the evil which she had brought down upon him.

But our old friend never thought of uttering one word.

On the way his thoughts were about equally divided between wondering what had become of his companions and how they had fared in their flight, and endeavouring to devise some means of escape.

The latter was a difficult enough task, and one that was more than sufficient to occupy all his thoughts.

He trusted that the extraordinary vigilance of his captors would abate after a reasonable time had elapsed, but he found, to his disappointment, that the nearer they drew to the metropolis the more did their watchfulness increase.

CHAPTER MLXV.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND HIS COMPANIONS ARRIVE AT BOW STREET POLICE-STATION.

"My eyes and limbs! What is coming now? Blow me up as tight as a bladder if ever I see such a thing afore! Here missus—missus, just come here, will you, and have a look! There's a treat in store for your eyesight—spificate me, if there isn't!"

These very extraordinary ejaculatory phrases were given utterance to disjointedly by the keeper of the tollgate at Tyburn.

He had just put his head outside of the door of his little wooden house, and, happening to look along the road to the westward, had caught sight of an extraordinary spectacle.

The latter part of his speech was addressed to his better half, who, having been on the late turn the preceding night, had not yet left her morning couch.

As may be supposed, the violent outcry had the effect of arousing her, and, actuated by that spirit of curiosity which is so prevailing a characteristic of the sex, sprang from the bed, and in a state of extraordinary dishabille, and without hesitation, projected her head through the window.

She then remained transfixed with astonishment, and became wholly unconscious of the extraordinary figure that she made.

The object which had attracted their attention so forcibly was the stage-coach, upon the top of which the police officers were clustered so thickly, and which was so completely surrounded by others on horseback.

"Good lauk!" ejaculated the tollkeeper's wife, at length "What can be the matter?"

"Blame me if I know!"

"It must be the Young Pretender caught at last! Serves him right! I hope he is."

"Don't be a fool, you idiot! Go and stick your stupid old head under the bed-clothes again! The Young Pretender! Bah! The idea of such a thing!"

"I hope as how it is the wagabone!" continued the fair lady, apparently unmoved by the epithets addressed to her by her husband. "It's how he ought to be, and all who think with him—them's my sentiments, and I don't care who knows them!"

For the behoof of those who may not quite understand what was meant by this sudden outbreak of mutual wrath we may as well simply state that the tollkeeper and his wife happened to belong to precisely the opposite parties of politics—he being a blind Jacobite, and she a staunch Hanoverian—so that, in consequence, many were the fiery encounters which occurred every day, every topic somehow leading to this irreconcilable one.

Probably these little lively discussions served to vary what must be the awful monotony of keeping a tollgate.

On the present occasion, however, the tollman himself was so much surprised at what he saw that he abandoned politics entirely.

"It's a d—d sight more likely to be Dick Turpin!" he muttered, as the cavalcade came nearer.

The words reached the ears of his yoke-fellow.

"Dick Turpin caught at last! I hope he is! Serves him right! So he ought to be—and all such villains!"

"Hold your row, will you! Don't I tell you that whenever you open your mouth you make a confounded fool of yourself!"

"That's as you may think; but when it comes to fooling——"

"Hold your row, I say! Can't you see they are close to the gate?"

Expectancy and curiosity now made the woman silent.

All her faculties were concentrated in gazing upon the spectacle before her.

The desire to know who it could be thus strongly and sedulously guarded now reached burning point.

A single horseman—a police officer—rode about two hundred yards in advance of the rest of the procession.

He was the one who had undertaken to arrange the relays upon the road; but as the place where the last change had been effected was passed he had fallen back upon the main body, and only rode forward now in order that there should be no delay at the toll-gate.

"Open—open!" he cried, as he came nearer. "Be quick, I command you, in the name of the King!"

"Will you settle for the toll?" was the pertinent question asked by the pikeman, as he fumbled in his pocket for the key.

"Yes, yes—of course I will."

"That's enough, then."

The gate was unlocked and opened.

During this operation the tollman said.

"May I make so bold as to inquire who it is [illegible]

you have so strongly guarded yonder? Is it Dick Turpin?"

"No—but one of his associates."

"Who?"

"Why, Sixteen-String Jack, to be sure, and the people that used to keep a ken for them."

"Who are they?"

"Stand aside, unless you wish to be trodden down under the horses' feet!"

The man shrank back quickly, and at the same moment the stage-coach and its escort dashed at a tremendous pace through the gate.

It was gone almost like a flash, and left nothing but a cloud of blinding, choking dust behind it.

"Fuff—puff—a-chew—a-tish-o! The devil!" sneezed the tollkeeper, whose lungs were full. "Tuppence a-piece for the horses, and thruppence for the coach."

The demand was settled, and the police officer galloped after his companions.

The hour was comparatively speaking an early one, and but few people as yet appeared in the streets of the metropolis, for the shops were closed.

Yet those who were abroad turned without exception a glance of strong curiosity upon the throng as it dashed by, and many were the speculations indulged in as to the meaning of what they saw.

Few guessed rightly.

On rolled the cortege without interruption or delay until Bow Street was reached.

With a dash and a clatter as had not been heard there for many a day they pulled up the panting horses in front of the entrance to the station.

A scene of tremendous and indescribable noise and confusion ensued, which was in part caused by the mounted officers endeavouring to surround the stage-coach still more closely, and by those who were on the top descending hastily, so as to be in readiness for action, should it be requisite.

With that facility and rapidity for which London is famous, a crowd of persons assembled in the street, and every fleeting second witnessed some accession to their number.

The officials in the police-station were all on the alert, and the superintendent soon made his appearance.

All were alike impatient and anxious to know what important prisoner it was that had arrived.

Under the directions of Mr. Skellum, who was of course puffed up by importance, the officers on foot were drawn up so as to form a kind of lane reaching from the door of the coach to the door of the police station.

All was expectation and suspense.

Ellen was the first lifted out of the coach.

With downcast head and streaming eyes she hurried as rapidly as she could through the living thoroughfare, and felt relieved when she passed beneath the dark and gloomy portal.

Two police officers conducted her to the charge-room.

Mrs. Davis was lifted out next.

The journey had told most fearfully upon her.

She was more like one dead than alive, and had so far lost all use of her limbs that she had to be carried by her guards, who deposited her upon the rude bench just inside the charge-room—so called, because it was here that prisoners were in the first instance taken, in order that the charge against them may be entered by the inspector.

Tom Davis followed.

Poor fellow! he strove to keep up as brave an appearance as he could for the sake of those with whom he was connected, but he succeeded very indifferently indeed.

Sixteen-String Jack was the last to leave the vehicle.

The public curiosity had now reached its highest point, for it had become known who he was, and all present were equally anxious to catch a glimpse of the bold highwayman of whom they had heard so much.

"He looks helpless enough now, anyway," remarked one of the bystanders.

The remark was true enough.

Jack was helpless.

He had to be lifted out by two strong men.

The cord with which he had been so tightly bound had never once been moved or slackened since the commencement of the journey.

The consequence was that all his muscles had stiffened, until he had lost all power over them.

It was a despairing, dejected glance which our poor friend cast around him as he was quickly hurried past his foes.

He scarcely dared to hope that he should catch sight of any friendly, well-known countenance; but that he had, almost unknown to himself as it were, indulged in such a hope was evidenced by the disappointment he felt upon being carried into the narrow passage without having done so.

Owing to the restrictions of the circulation, he was icy cold, and his heart only beat with the feeblest of pulsations.

So serious was his condition deemed that his bonds were at once released and his limbs chafed before a roaring fire, the warmth of which seemed to have the effect of infusing some little vigour into the scarcely animate frame of Mrs. Davis.

Jack soon felt the better for this treatment, and by the time the operation was over the inspector made his appearance at the little wooden desk by the window, and prepared to enter the charges in the book before him.

This matter of form was speedily gone through.

The least important of the prisoners—that is to say, Tom Davis, his wife, and Ellen—were dealt with first.

The charge against the first was, of course, his having escaped from custody after a previous conviction.

The two next, merely for having been found in the company of the highwaymen.

Then it came to Jack's turn.

"What charge shall I enter against him?" the inspector asked.

"Why, highway robbery, of course."

"But what one in particular?"

"That cannot be told at present. It will be enough for you to enter the general charge, as the rewards have been out for him so long."

"I don't want to be told my duty by such as you!" growled the inspector.

"It is your fault that I spoke at all," retorted the officer.

"Hold your row a minute! Now sign this."

The book was pushed towards him, and then he wrote his name.

This brought the preliminary business to a conclusion.

The next step was to remove the prisoners to some place of security until the time came for opening the Court.

Some little discussion arose upon this point.

The usual course was to remove all prisoners to a large underground cell, where they were all herded together like so many cattle.

But it was considered by Mr. Skellum that this would not suit any of his prisoners, who were required to be looked after with much more than ordinary care.

Finally, it was settled that Ellen and Mrs. Davis should be confined together in one cell, the state of the latter being such as to require attention.

Tom Davis was accommodated with a separate chamber, in which also sat two well-armed police officers, who were instructed to watch closely his every movement, and raise an immediate alarm if the least reason arose for doing so.

Sixteen-String Jack was also conveyed to a separate cell, but his bonds were not removed.

Four officers shared the cell with him; and Mr. Skellum's dread of Sixteen-String Jack's power of escape was so great that he also deputed four more men to watch on the outside of the double-locked and strongly-barred door.

After that he felt tolerably assured of their safety; but he could by no means make up his mind to quit the station, though he was so worn out with fatigue as scarcely to be able to rise after having once sat down.

But it was necessary that some specific charge should be preferred against Sixteen-String Jack when he was brought before the magistrate.

There was no time to lose in seeing to this.

The aid of the inspector was called in.

"We must have something sure and undisputed," Skellum said to him.

"What is it to be?"

"The difficulty is, I suppose, to make a selection?"

"Just so."

"Then consider it over'

"I have it."

"Well?"

"Do you remember that case that occurred not long since, when this Sixteen-String Jack, in conjunction with Claude Duval, robbed a couple of bailiffs?"

"Yes—yes!"

"That will be the case, then."

"Right."

"But can you find these men?"

"Yes, without difficulty."

"And have them in readiness to appear when the Court opens?"

"Yes—then or very soon after it."

"Then let me request you to see to it at once."

The inspector promised that no time should be lost; and Mr. Skellum, in despite of his anxiety and determination to be wakeful, dozed off to sleep at the top of the steps which led to the cells in which his prisoners were confined.

He was aroused by the return of the inspector.

"All right," he said. "They will be here directly. The case is as clear as daylight, and will serve well enough for the first and principal count on the indictment at the sessions. He is sure to be convicted."

"I should think so," said Skellum, stretching himself wearily. "If I could have my way, such fellows should be strung up as soon as captured. It would be the saving of a world of trouble and expense."

"You are right. If such was the law of the land there would be fewer such freebooters abroad, I'm thinking."

"What's the time?"

"Close on ten. But I've been thinking, Mr. Skellum——"

"What?"

"Why, that since they have been here you have given the prisoners no breakfast. Who knows, they might be owdacious enough to complain about it?"

"They might; but I will just pop down and see myself how they are getting on, and I will ask them at the same time whether they would like to take anything. I shall feel better satisfied when I have seen with my own eyes that they are all right."

Accordingly Skellum, with some difficulty, arose, for all his limbs felt stiffer than ever.

Down he went to the cells, where he found everything just as he could wish it.

His question as to whether any refreshment was wanted was answered negatively in all cases.

With a feeling of tolerable satisfaction, nevertheless, Skellum made his way to the upper air again.

He then found that the magistrate had arrived, and the Court had opened.

As was usually the case, the long list of "night charges," as they are termed, had to be disposed of.

An hour was generally thus occupied, for the chief magistrate made very short work of the delinquents.

By that time Skellum hoped the two bailiffs would arrive, because he wished to have a little confidential talk with them before they stood up in the witness-box.

In this hope he was not disappointed.

The inspector soon after brought the two men before him, and a long whispered conference ensued.

CHAPTER MLXVI.

THE MAGISTRATE DULY COMMITS SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND HIS COMPANIONS TO TAKE THEIR TRIAL AT THE NEXT OLD BAILEY SESSIONS.

THE intelligence that Sixteen-String Jack, the notorious highwayman, had been brought in a coach, a strongly-bound prisoner, to Bow Street police-station flew with lightning-like rapidity all over London.

No one who heard the news was uninterested in it, and for that morning at least our old friend formed the general topic of conversation.

For one anxious to be known among men, this would doubtless have been very delightful; but Jack thought nothing at all of the matter.

Indeed, he would much rather that the public tongue had been otherwise employed.

Upon no one, however, did the intelligence produce so deep an effect as on Old Matthew.

The shock first of all deprived him of all sense and motion.

But with returning consciousness came absolute incredulity.

He could not bring himself to believe that such an awful catastrophe had taken place.

But from everyone he heard some confirmation of the disastrous news.

As we have said, all lips were employed upon the subject.

Many and various were the details of the affair; but about the main fact there was universal consistency.

Old Matthew resolved to set out and learn the truth.

He could bear to hear the worst much better than he could bring himself to remain in inaction and doubtful suspense.

The distance to the Bow Street police-station was not great, so that in a few moments after leaving his own door he reached his destination.

The great concourse of people standing in the roadway afforded corroborative evidence that something very unusual had occurred.

Mingling with the throng Matthew listened to the remarks made by those around him.

These served to confirm the worst.

The most general account was that Sixteen-String Jack and several of his accomplices were fast prisoners, and that his comrades had been mortally wounded, and by this time were doubtless on their way to London under the protection of a strong escort.

Old Matthew groaned inwardly.

By what he heard, he soon came to find how it was that the officers had got upon the highwaymen's track, and he bitterly blamed himself for his own want of caution.

He saw plainly enough that he, and he alone, had been the primary cause of the disaster.

Had he but made use of a greater amount of care and precaution, most probably nothing of the kind would have happened—at any rate, the severity of the misfortune would have been much mitigated.

His self-reproaches were of the keenest character.

But, as the reader knows full well, Old Matthew was not the man to dwell idly upon any grievance, no matter how serious the character of it might be.

Accordingly, before many minutes had elapsed, he set himself to work to think what would be the best thing to be done upon the present emergency.

He had the strongest wish to aid Sixteen-String Jack and those who were with him; but the question was, how should he accomplish it?

After much anxious deliberation he could think of nothing better than to engage a lawyer to watch the case at the police court.

For this there was no time to lose, as the hour for commencing business in the court was close at hand.

With some difficulty, then, Old Matthew disengaged himself from the dense mass of people by whom he was surrounded, and walked meditatively away.

"I am afraid it will be quite a useless thing," he said, to himself. "His commitment is sure to follow—not the eloquence and subtlety of all the lawyers in the land can prevent it. Still, for all that, if Jack finds some one there, it will serve as a reminder to him that he is by no means forgotten by his friends."

The last consideration had the effect of fixing his determination in his mind, and with a firmer and more rapid step he made his way towards Lyon's Inn.

Passing under the gloomy archway, he directed his course towards a tall, dingy-looking house situated in one corner of the quadrangle.

"I know not whether I shall find him here so early," muttered Matthew, as he ascended a dark and narrow flight of stairs; "and yet, I suppose, like plenty more, he sleeps at his chambers."

The portly landlord had to pause more than once in his ascent of the stairs; but at length he paused before a door at the summit of the topmost flight.

He had to knock repeatedly before any notice was taken of his presence, and then the door was opened by a young man in a very alarming condition of undress.

He seemed astonished when he beheld his visitor; but after a momentary hesitation he invited him to enter.

Old Matthew obeyed.

It needed but one glance round the apartment into which he had just penetrated to afford satisfactory evidence that the inmate of it was by no means well off in worldly goods and chattels.

Indeed, the aspect of poverty was so apparent as to send a chill through Old Matthew's heart.

"You look surprised to see me, Mr. Godfrey," the landlord began; "but you told me once, when sitting in my bar-parlour, that you should look upon anyone who gave you a little legal employment as a benefactor, and so——"

"And so my warm-hearted friend," said the young man addressed, his thin and wasted face lighted up the while with a feeble smile—"and so you have been getting into trouble of some sort merely in order to—to——"

"No, my young friend, you mistake; but some persons in whom I happen to feel a very warm interest are at this moment in much distress and danger, and I have come to you, thinking you might be able to help them out of it."

"Well—well," said the young lawyer, with greater huskiness of manner observable than before, "I will do my best. But let me know in what precise circumstances your friends stand."

Old Matthew, then, with great freedom, told him just what had happened, and requested him to watch the case on behalf of the prisoners when they were taken before the magistrate.

But the young lawyer shook his head.

"You don't feel inclined to mix yourself up in the business, then?" said Matthew, rising from the rickety chair on which he had been seated. "I should not have thought," he added, as he glanced around at the bare walls, "that you would have been so scrupulous."

"Nay, nay—do not be offended, Mr. Gale. You are too hasty. You did not understand me."

Old Matthew stopped at once.

"I mean that I can do nothing that will be of service to these people. The public and legal feeling is very strong against them, and you may depend every effort will be tried to make an example of them."

"I know all that; but still it would be better that they should not be altogether undefended, and if you are willing to undertake the case I myself will pay you liberally for your trouble."

The lawyer hesitated.

He felt that, so far as his future prospects were concerned, it would be by no means wise to mix himself up in so questionable a transaction as this.

But he had been waiting months and months in hunger and poverty for business of some sort to be brought to him; but none had come.

At the present moment he had all but reached the end of his resources.

If he threw this chance away it might be long indeed before he had another.

This consideration decided him.

He held out his hand to Old Matthew.

"Depend upon it," he said, "I will do my best, though I am afraid that when it is done you will think it but little."

"Make haste, and apparel yourself, then. I will wait here for you, and we will both walk to Bow Street together."

"As you please."

"I want you to procure me admission to the court," pursued Matthew; "and you may take my word for it that it will be no easy matter to-day."

"I can manage it, nevertheless, I daresay," was the response. "Sit down a moment. I will be with you almost immediately."

He passed into an adjoining room as he spoke.

But our old friend was too much agitated to be able to sit down quietly.

During the absence of the young man he walked about uneasily.

Fortunately, he was not long kept in suspense.

Mr. Godfrey appeared, and without further pause they descended into the street.

At a brisk pace they walked to the police-court; and such good use had Old Matthew made of his time that they reached it just as the proceedings were about to commence.

For the young lawyer to gain admittance was an easy enough matter, and a small gratuity slipped into the palm of the stern guardian at the door procured admittance for Old Matthew also, who was also so lucky as to get a seat among the lawyers.

Just as he sat down a side door was opened and the magistrate made his appearance.

His clerk was already seated at the little table below him, and immediately upon the appearance of his superior he stood up and whispered something which seemed of a very satisfactory nature, for the magistrate, whose face had been frowning and sullen, now smiled and rubbed his hands together briskly, as if much pleased.

The reader will guess that the communication was concerning Sixteen-String Jack and his associates.

The Court was now opened in due form, and the ordinary business of the day commenced.

Old Matthew thought there would never be an end to the tedious night charges; but at length the termination of his impatience was reached, for the last case was dismissed.

There was then an immediate stir and commotion in the little Court, as though all were preparing to listen with greater attention to what was about to follow next.

Matthew was most anxious and expectant, for he did not know who would be the first to be brought forward.

But his incertitude upon this point was quickly put an end to by the ushering of Mrs. Davis and Ellen into the dock.

The former, being quite unable to stand, was accommodated with a chair.

Ellen buried her face in her hands and sobbed bitterly.

"Who are these people?" asked the magistrate, in an under tone.

"Accomplices," whispered the clerk, in reply, yet loud enough to be heard almost all over the Court.

Then, rising to his feet, with a paper before him, he said:

"Prisoners at the bar, you are charged with aiding, abetting, and comforting several of the most notorious desperadoes in his Majesty's dominions, which is felony. Do you plead guilty or not guilty?"

Mrs. Davis was too far gone to pay attention to what was going on around her.

Ellen's voice was choked by her sobs and tears.

The magistrate's clerk repeated his question.

"Does anyone appear on behalf of these people?" inquired the magistrate.

"I do," replied Mr. Godfrey, rising immediately.

This had the effect of calling the attention of the prisoners to him.

Both at the same time saw Old Matthew, who nodded his head rapidly, as though to intimate that all was right.

His presence wonderfully composed both.

Mr. Godfrey came close to the dock, and, leaning over, whispered:

"Say, 'Not guilty,' both of you, as loud as you can, and leave the rest to me."

They nodded in acquiescence, and obeyed.

Mr. Skellum now placed himself in the witness-box.

He glanced around the court, and particularly at the magistrate, with a very self-satisfied air.

"Do you appear to give evidence against the prisoners?" asked the clerk.

"I do."

"What is your name?"

"Antrobus Skellum."

"And profession?"

"A—a—a—officer of police."

"What have you to depose?" inquired the magistrate, seeing that his spy was somewhat embarrassed by the last question.

"Your worship," he said, "on the eleventh of the present month I captured the two prisoners at Stonehenge. They were then in company with Dick Turpin and his notorious companions, and, from the way in which we found them all conferring together, I have no doubt they were planning some fresh and daring robbery."

"They have both been in custody before upon the same charge, I think?"

"They have. It is now only about a month since their liberation. They were let off the first time with an easy sentence."

"That, then, is the charge?"

"It is."

Another police officer was then called, who corroborated Skellum's testimony, and the magistrate said:

"Prisoners at the bar, what have you to say in your own defence?"

"Your worship," said Mr. Godfrey, rising quickly to his feet, "will, I presume, commit the prisoners for trial?"

"Sir——"

"I say your worship will, I presume——"

"I allow no one to presume in this Court."

"But——"

"Let me have none of your buts or barrels either!"

"Really, your worship, you will excuse me saying that this exhibition of petulance is very undignified and very unworthy of you."

The justice was unable to speak from passion, so Mr. Godfrey took advantage of his silence to say:

"I am advised to say that the prisoners will reserve their defence."

"Very good; then they stand committed to take their trial, and bail will not be taken; and if you or any other young jackanapes attempt to dictate to me I will have you committed for contempt of Court."

Mr. Godfrey sat down, very wisely taking no notice of what had just been said.

Tom Davis was next placed in the dock.

His eyes wandered round the Court as though in search of some one, and presently he saw Old Matthew, who again endeavoured to show that all was well.

"Prisoner at the bar," said the clerk, reading from his paper, "you stand charged with feloniously aiding, abetting, and comforting several desperate offenders against the law, to wit, Dick Turpin and others; and also with obstructing the officers in the discharge of their duty; and still further with having escaped from custody while on your way to a penal settlement to which you had been sentenced for the remaining term of your natural life. Prisoner at the bar, do you plead guilty or not guilty?"

In obedience to a whisper from Mr. Godfrey, a plea of not guilty was returned.

Mr. Skellum was again the chief witness, and he deposed, of course, to the capture of Tom Davis under the circumstances so well known to the reader.

Another witness—also a police officer—identified the prisoner as having before been tried and condemned, and having been removed from custody by the aid of a desperate band of highwaymen.

Mr. Godfrey again stated, in answer to the usual question, that the prisoner reserved his defence.

After this the magistrate had nothing else to do than commit the prisoner to take his trial at the next sessions at the Old Bailey—which he did pro forma.

Immediately afterwards the prisoner was removed.

Then again there was that indescribable commotion which betokened that all were anxious and expectant.

What had gone before might be likened to some trifling interlude at a theatre, introduced as a kind of preface to the piece de resistance of the evening.

All eyes were turned towards the narrow doorway through which the prisoners were brought into the Court.

There was a moment of suspenseful silence, and Sixteen-String Jack was more than half carried into the dock, where he remained with a police officer standing on each side of him.

CHAPTER MLXVII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK HAS A STRONG ESCORT TO NEWGATE.

EVEN after Sixteen-String Jack had taken up his position in the dock, the deep expectant silence continued.

All eyes were fixed upon him, for all were equally anxious to gaze upon so notorious and daring an offender against the laws.

It was sufficiently embarrassing to remain thus the cynosure of so many eyes, and subject to such close scrutiny; but our old friend preserved an undaunted calmness of demeanour which was as far removed from vulgar insolence as it was from shrinking cowardice.

As the silence continued, Jack took the opportunity of looking well round the Court, which he did apparently with a most unembarrassed air.

Of course, he saw his old associate and friend, the landlord of the White Horse; and one glance at his ruddy, jovial-looking countenance made the prisoner more comfortable and at ease in his mind than he had hitherto been.

Jack experienced to the full that intense satisfaction which all cannot help feeling when, in the hour of adversity, they find themselves not forgotten by those who were friendly in prosperity.

It was such a solace to Jack's heart as no words could possibly express.

It was a most unusual thing for a prisoner to be brought to the bar strongly bound as Sixteen-String Jack was, and this fact alone was the cause of a very great deal of attention being bestowed upon him.

"It is somewhat irregular, is it not, for a prisoner to be brought up thus?"

"It is," replied Mr. Skellum, glibly; "but the well-known recklessness and audacity of the prisoner made us feel that we were not exceeding our duty by taking these precautions to keep him perfectly secure."

This speech was greeted by a general hiss from the body of the spectators, coupled with loud cries of "Shame—shame!"

The magistrate stood up, black in the face with passion.

"Clear the Court," he yelled—"clear the Court! I will allow no such manifestations of sympathy with a desperate criminal like the one before us!"

A scene now of tremendous excitement and confusion ensued, for the police were only too glad to put the magistrate's injunction into execution.

But their task was not accomplished without a great deal of difficulty.

Finally, however, the numbers of the officers, and their hard, thick staves prevailed, and the people were driven out and the door closed.

In a minute or two afterwards comparative silence was obtained.

Mr. Skellum made a succession of bows, and intimated his desire to have an opportunity to speak.

"If your worship thinks," he said, in cringing tones, "that I have exceeded my duty in the care I have taken to have the prisoner strongly bound, with a view of preventing the possibility of an escape, and if your worship wishes it, the bonds can be unloosed."

"No—no!" replied the magistrate, at length. "I consider the desperate and well-known character of the accused is such as fully to warrant us in adopting this extreme course, for which the prisoner has only to thank his own violence."

"I am not aware that I have offered any," said Jack, firmly, speaking for the first time.

"Pray say nothing," whispered Mr. Godfrey, earnestly. "Leave all the talking to me. I want you to do nothing but plead not guilty when the proper moment comes."

Jack promised obedience.

The ordinary formalities were then commenced and proceeded with.

Jack put in his plea as he had been advised.

As before, Mr. Skellum made his appearance in the witness-box.

Having been sworn, the clerk asked:

"Do you recognise the prisoner at the bar?"

"I do."

"Who is he?"

"His name, I believe, is John Rann, but he is more commonly and popularly known as Sixteen-String Jack. He is so called in the handbill offering an aggregate reward of two thousand five hundred pounds for him and his accomplices."

"You have a description of him there, I suppose?"

"Yes, your worship."

"Read it."

Skellam obeyed.

"That establishes the identity beyond all question," remarked the magistrate. "We could not possibly have better evidence than that."

"Just so, your worship."

"Now let us hear the full particulars of the matter."

"Yes, your worship."

Amid a profound silence, Skellum began.

We shall give his narrative rather fully, as the reader will then comprehend what aspect the matter presented when treated by him.

"From certain information received, your worship, I went down to Stonehenge, where, as I had reason to suppose, the highwaymen contemplated a meeting."

"And you found you were right?"

"Yes, your worship. By carefully surrounding the place we found them all together. They were well armed, every one, and furious at so close a prospect of defeat. However, we rushed upon them, calling out to surrender. But instead of paying any attention, the most violent resistance was at once commenced. Pistols were fired, and we were obliged to make use of our weapons in self-defence."

"Well," said the magistrate, inquiringly, for Skellum paused, "is that all?"

"No, your worship."

"Go on, then."

"The resistance these men made cannot be imagined—as may be learned by the fact that five police officers have been killed, and ten more now lie dangerously wounded, and scarcely expected to recover."

"And the other highwaymen—where are they?"

"They succeeded in violently breaking through our ranks; but all three, or, I should say, four who thus got off were badly wounded, and separate bodies of officers were sent after each. They cannot fail to be captured ere long. I expect every moment to hear tidings of their death or capture."

"But this one, you say, you secured?"

"Yes, your worship, though it was with much more difficulty than your worship can form any conception of."

"It seems to me that you have acted very gallantly, and I will take care that your resolute and courageous conduct shall be duly represented in the proper quarter."

"Thanks, your worship. But I feel I have done no more than my duty," replied Skellum, in a whining tone, who, however, thought nothing of the kind.

"Well—well, say no more about that. Go on with your deposition. Can you, or any of your force, positively swear that one of the police officers received his death-wound at the hands of the prisoner at the bar?"

"I have no doubt that such is the case," said Mr. Skellum, after a momentary hesitation, for he seemed in doubt how to reply; "but——"

"You cannot prove it?"

"I cannot, your worship—that is, not satisfactorily."

"Enough. But you have some specific charge against him?"

"Oh, yes, your worship!"

"What is it?"

"Two highly-respectable men will identify him, and also swear to him as one of two by whom they were attacked and robbed only a short time ago."

"That will do, then. You can stand down."

Skellum looked askance at Mr. Godfrey, as though he quite expected to be cross-examined; but he was disappointed.

The lawyer merely made a sign; but it expressed plainly enough, "Stand down; I don't want you."

One of the bailiffs was then put into the witness-box.

He was a snabby, underminded-looking fellow, who fidgeted with the front of the witness-box as though very far from being at his ease.

"Well, what is your name?"

"John Rutter."

"What are you?"

"A bailiff."

"Look at the prisoner at the bar. Do you recognise him?"

"I do."

"Who is he?"

"The man who robbed me of a large sum of money and put me in great bodily fear of my life."

"Was it the prisoner who took the money?"

"It was."

"And you swear positively that this is the same man?"

"Most positively, your worship."

"Just relate briefly the particulars of the case."

The bailiff complied.

As, however, all the details of the adventure between Claude and Jack and the two tipstaves must be fresh in the recollection of the reader, we forbear from repeating his words.

Although he considerably exaggerated the occurrence, yet the deviation from the absolute truth was not extraordinary.

Mr. Godfrey did not think proper to ask this witness any questions.

Indeed, he saw that nothing could save Jack from committal, so that it would have been an absolute waste of time.

The other bailiff then corroborated what had been said by his partner, and this closed the case.

The evidence was certainly more than sufficient to warrant the magistrate in discharging the duty required at his hands in such cases.

"Prisoner at the bar," he exclaimed, "have you anything to say?"

Mr. Godfrey rose instantly.

"Your worship," he said, "as the accused will inevitably be sent to take his trial, he reserves his defence till then, being unwilling to occupy needlessly your worship's valuable time."

"I shouldn't wonder," said the magistrate sneeringly.

Then, in a different voice, he added, turning to the dock:

"Prisoner at the bar, you stand fully committed to take your trial at the next sessions at the Old Bailey, upon the charge of highway robbery, and of obstructing his Majesty's officers in the execution of their duty."

This was the last case, and as the worthy magistrate had some luncheon waiting for him in the adjoining room he made a precipitate and very undignified retreat through the little door by means of which he had gained admission to the Court.

At a given signal a stream of officers poured into the Court for the purpose of removing the prisoner.

We should have stated that, when the order for clearing the Court was carried out, our old friend Matthew was not ejected.

This was solely through the good offices of the lawyer, next to whom he was seated.

Now that the magistrate had left the Court the worthy landlord did not hesitate to quit his place and press towards the dock.

Sixteen-String Jack saw him, and smiled a recognition.

But the smile was a sickly and feeble one: by no means like that which in former times habitually irradiated his features.

"Be of good heart, Jack," Matthew cried, though Mr. Godfrey plucked him by the sleeve and besought him to be silent—"be of good heart, old boy! Remember you have friends yet who will do the best they can for you."

Jack shook his head, which was, indeed, about the only movement he was capable of making.

The officers then closed densely round him.

Skellum looked at Old Matthew with a hungry eye, as though he would much have liked to take him prisoner.

But Matthew knew well enough that the words he had made use of were not enough to bring him within the power of the law.

But Skellum resolved that a good watch should be set upon the contumacious landlord, of whose powers he, with good reason, had abundant dread.

By main bodily force Sixteen-String Jack was lifted up by his guards, and in this manner carried out of the Court into an adjoining room.

Old Matthew and the lawyer went towards the street.

[SIXTEEN-STRING JACK IN HIS CELL AT NEWGATE.]

This now presented a startling spectacle.

It was completely blocked up as far as ever the eye could reach in every direction by a surging, swaying mass of human beings, who had all been drawn to the spot in the hope of catching a glimpse of the notorious prisoner.

The same desire caused all the windows and house-tops around from which a view might be obtained to be lined with faces.

"If they were only in the humour," mused Matthew, as his eye wandered over the vast assemblage, "how easy it would be to make Jack a free man!"

It was quite easy to see, however, that no such thought as this found a home in the breasts of those who composed the huge multitude.

So long as their gaping curiosity was gratified, their satisfaction would be complete.

The appearance of Matthew and his companion at the door, together with certain movements on the part of the police officers, caused the whisper to circulate with lightning-like rapidity among the crowd:

"He's coming—he's coming!"

Matthew and the lawyer were quickly compelled to quit their position, as they would otherwise have interfered with the arrangements made.

The same anxious care and determination to avoid all risk of escape characterised the present movements of the police.

All the officers who could be spared were drawn up in a double line, which commenced at the threshold of the police-court and ended at the door of the hackney-coach which had been provided for the transit of the prisoner to Newgate.

All these men were armed with drawn cutlasses

No. 232 will be Published next Thursday.

It will be understood that they thus formed a lane of about five yards in length, the walls of which were composed of resolute men.

The barrier was one by no means to be easily broken through.

The hackney-coach was also surrounded in a similar manner, in order to prevent the populace from crowding too closely round it.

Jack's case was hopeless indeed.

Had he been possessed of ever so much subtlety and strength, escape would have been impossible.

A few moments of anxious suspense elapsed.

Then the prisoner appeared.

It was hard indeed, if not impossible, for those who were on foot to distinguish him from his captors, so closely was he surrounded by them.

Not content with the way in which he had been secured already, fresh bonds had been added, and the effect of these was to deprive him of the use of every limb.

Just as though he had been some carefully-packed piece of statue-work the highwayman was carried down the passage and across the pavement to the door of the coach, which was held wide open in readiness to receive him.

The mob set up a cheer, though what they cheered at is hard to say; but, then, it is well known that a British mob eagerly seizes upon making any kind of demonstration.

Sixteen-String Jack was lifted into the vehicle, and deposited in a somewhat awkward manner upon one of the seats.

As many officers as the carriage would conveniently hold crowded in after him for the purpose of keeping a strict watch upon all his proceedings.

The others sat on the roof with their legs dangling down over the windows, while others, again, seated themselves upon the driver's seat.

In the meanwhile, under the directions of Skellum, those police officers who had assisted in forming the living lane were sent to reinforce those who formed a ring round the coach.

As soon as this was done Mr. Skellum gave a signal, and the horses were immediately set in motion.

This occasioned another cheer from the populace, who, far from having their curiosity gratified, resolved to follow the vehicle to its destination.

Owing to the great weight of the load, the two lean-ribbed horses harnessed to the hackney-coach were unable to take it at a more rapid rate than a walk.

But this pace just suited those officers who had to keep up with them, their orders being to preserve the cordon strictly until they reached the prison.

Slow and tedious was the journey.

Many and various were the stoppages that took place.

To Jack the time seemed twice as long as it was in reality.

To some extent this was occasioned by the discomfort which he experienced.

His position was as awkward and uncomfortable a one as could have been imagined, and it would have been an easy enough matter to alter it.

But the police showed no inclination to trouble themselves, and Jack would have suffered anything rather than have made the request—perhaps, even, to be refused.

At length the corner of the Old Bailey was turned, and the gloomy walls of Newgate came into view.

Jack knew it, though he was so placed that he could not see them.

In another moment the jolting, lumbering conveyance came to a final halt.

CHAPTER MLXVIII.

REVERTS TO THE PERILOUS POSITION OF DICK TURPIN AND MAUD.

FAIN would we continue exclusively to devote ourselves to a consideration of Sixteen-String Jack, now he is in a position of so much greater danger than any that had befallen him during the whole of his long career.

But in order to preserve something like a chronological sequence of events it is imperative that we should leave him awhile upon the very threshold of the heart-chilling old prison of Newgate.

We promise, however, to return to him with all possible celerity.

But there are others on behalf of whom it is believed the reader feels an interest of no ordinary kind, and whose perils, if anything, exceeded those which happened to Jack himself.

Of the subsequent movements of his comrades nothing further is known than what was stated by Mr. Skellum in the presence of the magistrate.

Whether his confident anticipations of a speedy further capture were well or ill founded we shall now proceed to show.

First of all, then, we shall devote ourselves to a relation of what befel our hero, Dick Turpin.

It will be recollected how gallantly he had raised Maud upon finding that she had been wounded, and how the consciousness of her imminent and deadly danger had enabled him successfully to fight his way through the death-storm that raged around him.

He had swung Maud on to the saddle before him, and mounted himself.

Then, while the bullets showered round him like hail he had urged Black Bess to make speed now if ever she had done so in her life before.

Need we say how nobly the gallant, incomparable steed acquitted herself?

Her speed was something which, if beheld, would make the observer believe that "his eyes were the fools of his other senses."

It the twinkling of an eye her sable form mingled with, and was swallowed up by, the darkness which everywhere prevailed.

On the soft turf her hoof-strokes were inaudible, or nearly so.

But although his pursuers were soon left behind, Dick would not suffer her to relax her speed.

On the wide open plain of Salisbury no refuge could be found for him—he must make his way to some place miles and miles off.

Since their starting Maud had never once moved in the slightest degree.

He had called to her.

But in vain.

No answer was returned to his earnest words.

He felt her hands.

They were icy cold.

So, too, was her face.

Again and again he called as they rushed headlong on in the deep darkness, but with no better result than before.

He placed his hand upon her breast, but withdrew it instantly.

He had touched something cold, clammy, and sticky.

He knew full well what it was without the aid of vision.

It was blood.

A terrible groan escaped his lips.

Then he turned his head to listen.

Floating faintly upon the wind he heard, or fancied he could hear, the trampling of many horses' feet upon the turf, as well as loud shouts and cries.

"I cannot stop now," he muttered, as he urged Bess to make fresh exertions. "That would only be to precipitate our fate. No, no! On, Bess—on, my lass! Our only hope is in speedily reaching some place of shelter."

But where was he to seek for this, with the whole country alive with foes all eagerly searching for him?

Oh, how he wished that Tom King was with him!

By his guidance, the vessel engaged to take them across the Channel could have been gained, and then, doubtless safety would have laid before them.

As it was, Dick had only the vaguest idea in the world of the position of the smugglers' cave.

Could he but have reached this it would have been a place of safe refuge.

But in this he was equally at fault.

So sudden, too, had been his flight from the ruins, and so intense the darkness which prevailed, that he could not take upon himself to say with any degree of certitude whether he was going in the direction of the sea-coast or away from it.

He was compelled, too, to keep on this random course for the want of knowing which way to turn out of it.

These reflections, together with Maud's continued state of inanimation, seemed to have the effect of searing his heart and brain with fire.

On, on he sped, until the seemingly interminable expanse of Salisbury Plain was crossed.

On, on farther and farther still—across dusty high-roads—down narrow, winding lanes—over the open country—away—away—

Past houses and little clusters of humble cottages—places where he would fain have stopped for a brief space in order that Maud's hurt might be looked to; but in vain—in vain.

Either in reality, or else in his exaggerated fancy, he could still hear his pursuers tearing after him with redoubled speed, and calling upon him to surrender.

Although the speed of his mare was now greater than he had ever known it to be before, he did not scruple to urge her to still greater efforts.

To say that the various objects in the landscape seemed to sweep past them like rapidly-flitting shadows would be to convey a feeble and inadequate idea of her tremendous rate of speed.

And still Maud had neither moved nor spoken, nor had she shown herself to be in the slightest degree conscious of Dick's anxious and impassioned calls to her.

He had placed his hand over her heart—in close and dangerous proximity to which vital organ was a gaping wound. He pressed tightly upon it, for by this means the flow of blood was checked, and at the same time he tried to ascertain whether there was any pulsation.

At times he fancied he could detect a feeble, fluttering beat; but it was so faint and so uncertain that he was full of doubts upon it.

And every moment of his headlong career the agony he suffered was almost beyond endurance.

What if Maud should die?

What if this ghastly wound should prove a fatal one?

The thought drove him frantic.

The blood in his veins seemed turned to liquid, boiling metal.

A mist came over his eyes.

All objects seemed bathed in blood, and it was only by a great effort and a species of instinct that he retained his balance, for he had swayed fearfully to one side.

He had forgotten all about his own wound.

The excitement under which he had laboured since receiving it had made him altogether forgetful that he had received an injury at all.

Now it only made its presence felt by means of the weakness that had been produced by excessive loss of blood.

This proves, of course, that the wound was by no means of a serious character.

Indeed, had it been bound up at the first, probably nothing more would have been felt of it, the injury being quite superficial.

The violent exertion of riding on horseback at such a furious pace, as well as the feverish condition of his blood, caused the hemorrhage to be much greater than it would have been under other circumstances.

But finding that he grew rapidly weaker every moment, Dick brought his foaming steed to standstill.

He then roughly and hastily bound up his wound; but the task of doing so at all was one of no ordinary difficulty.

The good effects of it, however, very quickly made themselves apparent.

He listened—listened intently, for there came upon his ears faintly and from afar off a strange monotonous sound.

"What is it?" Dick asked himself—"what is it?"

He listened again.

"It is the sea!" he cried, in a voice of joyfulness.

"We must be at no great distance from the coast. Fast as you have been, Bess, lass, I little thought you had brought us so far in such a little time. Yes, yes, there can be no doubt about it—it is the sea!"

At this moment Maud made a slight movement.

It was the first since they had left the ruins.

A faint, fluttering sigh also escaped her lips.

The sound made Dick's heart bound within him.

"Maud dearest!" he cried. "Listen—oh! listen to me! Cheer up! Believe me, the danger now is past, and we are safe! Hark! can you not hear the breakers roar? We are close to the coast, and in a few minutes we shall reach it."

Dick paused anxiously for a reply.

But none came.

He was left equally in doubt as to whether Maud was incapable of utterance, or whether she had failed to hear the words which he had addressed to her.

In either case it was folly to linger longer.

The first and most important step was to get out of danger, and he strongly felt that every moment of time was of incalculable importance.

Accordingly, despite his anguished state of doubt, he again set Black Bess in motion.

Unexpectedly finding himself thus at the sea coast changed the current of all Dick's previous thoughts and intentions.

He felt now that he could not do a wiser thing than engage some little vessel to take them across the Channel.

The only thing against it was that Maud's hurt required immediate attention, and that the delay and journey across the sea would have the effect of aggravating its unfavourable symptoms.

But, then, on the other hand, it seemed quite certain that, under the most favourable conditions, a considerable length of time would elapse before Maud would be sufficiently recovered to move, and it was too much to expect that they would be allowed to remain undisturbed by the police officers during such an interval.

From the strengh of the force which had attacked them—so much more numerous than any other which had been brought against them—he was sure that unrelaxing efforts would be made to recapture him.

He had pursued a tolerably straight course hitherto, having put into practice no stratagem whatever of a character calculated to lead them astray.

All that he had gained was time; and if he only gave the officers the opportunity they would soon be up with him again.

Then, with Maud lying on a sick couch, what could he do?

Not leave her to the care of others, for she was obnoxious to the law like himself, and they would show her no consideration because of her injuries.

The only chance that he had was to quit the coast altogether.

Whether he should be able to do this or not was doubtful; but with an undaunted heart Dick rode on.

It was never his nature to meet difficulties half way.

He waited till they faced him, and then his undaunted resolution generally enabled him to overcome them.

Already he could see in the distance a long white line of light, which indicated the whereabouts of the breakers.

Animated by the sight, he pushed on with more rapidity.

At last the water's edge was reached.

The spot upon which he had chanced was a bleak and desolate one.

As far as the eye could reach on either side nothing could be seen but a long line of broken, jagged coast, on which the waves broke ceaselessly with a tumultuous roar.

No human habitation could be descried.

Dick's heart sank within him when he asked himself the question, what human beings could be found who would choose such a spot for an abiding-place?

Some distance further on he might perhaps find what he sought; but he knew not which direction to take—the right or the left.

Scarcely pausing to consider—for an hour's deliberation would not have brought him any nearer to a decision—he chose the latter.

The nature of the ground was such as to prevent any considerable speed being made.

Yet he pushed on with greater swiftness than anyone could have expected.

Suddenly, however, he came upon a small indentation in the shore, which had been hidden from him by the huge masses of rock.

Nothing could have come upon him more unexpectedly.

He pulled up, and uttered an exclamation, the tone of which showed that he had made a pleasant discovery.

And in truth he had.

Below him, but easily accessible by means of a zigzag path, could be seen a small cluster of cottages, seemingly the abode of fishermen.

Drawn up high and dry on the beach were several boats of various sizes, but all of such a kind as would be used for fishing.

Dick now believed that the way of escape lay clear and plain before him.

Without hesitation he commenced to descend the zigzag path we have mentioned.

A few minutes served to bring him to the huts, for by this word they are most appropriately called.

The inhabitants of the little hamlet seemed long since to have retired to rest.

From one window, and one only, came a dim, uncertain ray of light.

To Dick Turpin it was a beacon, and he hastened towards it with rapid strides.

Arriving at the door, he knocked loudly at it.

But he had to knock a second time before any notice was taken.

Then the door was opened, and the gaunt, attenuated figure of a man presented itself upon the threshold.

The flickering light from the small, rude-made iron lamp he carried vividly displayed the deep, sunken hollow of his cheeks.

"Who are you?" he said, in hoarse, guttural tones, which were in admirable keeping with the roughness of his exterior. "What want you, that you should disturb the dying at this hour?"

The word "dying" struck upon Dick's heart with an ominous chill.

So much so, that, without being conscious of so doing, he echoed it.

"Ay, dying," reiterated the man. "Tell me quickly what you want?"

"I am in sore distress and danger," said Dick, "and I want an immediate passage to France."

"Then you want what you cannot have."

"Why not?"

"Why not? Because there is no man living who would venture to put off from the shore to-night. Immediate destruction would be the result. Had it not been so, think you those boats would be lying idly on the beach?"

Dick's heart sank within him.

Already he fancied the officers were upon him.

Certainly they would arrive ere long.

"Well," said the man, "why stand you here? Have I not spoken? I say again it is impossible."

"My good friend," said Dick, in a deep and broken voice, "did you not tell me some one was dying here?"

"Ay, my wife."

"Your wife?" repeated Dick, struck with the strangeness of the coincidence.

"Yes—and the best that ever man was blessed with! When she is gone I—I——"

Sobs choked his further utterance, and tears rolled down the rugged, weatherbeaten face.

"Is the case hopeless?" said Dick—"wholly and completely hopeless? Is there nothing that can be done that will give her some chance of recovery?"

"Why—why, yes, there is; but it was a mockery for the doctor to mention it."

"What is it?"

"Never mind. Why should I parley with you?"

"Simply because I, too, have the same grief as yourself. My wife, who is with me here, is, I fear, dying, and the only chance there is of saving both her life and mine is that we reach the French coast to-morrow."

"That is your sole chance?"

"It is."

"Heaven help you, then!"

"But what is yours?"

"Why, delicacies—nutritious substances, luxuries only within the reach of the rich man's purse. The idea," he added, with a bitter laugh, "to tell that to a man who is himself dying for the bare necessaries of life!"

"Hush—hush!" said Dick. "Be calm."

"Calm?"

"Yes. Repine no longer, for I believe that it is decreed by fate that we shall be of assistance to each other."

"In what way do you mean?" asked the man, with extreme eagerness.

"Listen, and I will tell you."

"Well?"

"If you save my wife's life by the performance of the service I require, I, in return for it, will give you such a sum of money as will make you comparatively a rich man for life—so rich that there is no delicacy, however extravagant in price, which will be beyond your powers of purchase."

CHAPTER MLXIX.

DICK TURPIN SUCCEEDS IN GETTING A PASSAGE TO THE COAST OF FRANCE.

The man looked upon Dick with an air of amazed incredulity.

He was speechless.

"Do you understand me?" Dick asked, at length.

"Are you in earnest?"

"I never was more so in my life. Come, speak quickly! Say whether the deaths of three persons shall rest upon your head."

The man hesitated.

"You want to cross to France?"

"I do."

"And now?"

"At once."

"I fear it is certain death to attempt it."

"Tush—tush, man! Who can say?"

"Well, I can; for you may believe me or not as you think proper, but there is no man here who could be found willing to put off to sea on such a boisterous night."

"But think of what a powerful incentive you have before you! You might not, perhaps, feel inclined to risk your all upon the uncertain chance of catching a few fish, but yet you might if you knew that your wife's life was at stake, and that you could save it."

"I know not who you are," said the man, with sudden energy, "thus to tempt me to destruction, but—but make good your promise, and—and I will take you."

"I swear to do so," said Dick, solemnly—"swear by everything which men hold sacred!"

"Enough! I consent."

"And how long will it take you to make your preparations?"

"Half an hour."

"It must be less."

"It shall be, if possible."

"Then I will alight and enter. I see you have a fire burning, and the warmth may serve to recover my wife from her swoon."

While speaking, he slipped from the saddle and tried to lift Maud down.

But his strength was insufficient.

The fisherman ran to his assistance, and by their united exertions Maud was carried in.

"Why—why," cried the fisherman, in surprise, "here is blood!"

"Yes; did I not tell you she was wounded?"

"I did not hear you."

"Quick—quick! I will tell you more anon—at present we have no time to talk."

"What is it?" cried some one, in a feeble voice—so feeble that Dick felt Death must be very close at hand indeed.

The voice came from one corner of the hut.

There was not much light, but still Dick could just perceive the outlines of a dark mass, apparently of rags, which served the purpose of a bed.

A second glance enabled him to make out the wasted form of a woman, who looked around her in manifest amazement.

"Hush—hush, Bessie!" said the fisherman, in a voice so tender that Dick could scarcely believe his ears served him rightly. "Do not excite yourself, but take my word that all is well. Fortune has sent this gentleman to save us. He requires a quick passage to France, and I have agreed to take him; and the payment I shall receive will make us rich for life."

"No, no," said the woman, wildly—"do not go—do not trust yourself again upon the sea! You told me to-night that no one could set out."

"Yes—yes," said the man, soothingly; "but that is some hours ago. Be content to leave this matter quite to me, and in the end all will be well."

"No, no—not well! But I am dying—slowly but surely dying!"

"But you remember what the doctor said, Bessie?" exclaimed the fisherman, bending over the humble bed. "He told you that if you could have certain things you would recover, and this gentleman will give me enough to enable me to buy them."

The woman wept.

"I see how it is," she said, through her tears, "though you would fain conceal it from me. You are willing desperately to risk your life upon the bare chance of saving me."

"No—no."

"But I say yes!"

"And I again say no! Not only does your life, but the lives of this gentleman and his wife, depend upon me; and must I selfishly sacrifice them all? No, no! I must go, Bessie. Keep up your spirits till I return—I shall not be long."

The woman wept still.

There was a gloomy, heavy foreboding in her heart.

While these words had been passing between the fisherman and his wife, Dick had by no means been an idle listener.

On the contrary, he had placed Maud in as comfortable a position as he could in front of the fire, in the hope of infusing fresh warmth into her chilled frame.

He also endeavoured to ascertain the character of the wound.

But he found the blood had coagulated in a mass over the orifice, thus forming a natural styptic.

He knew well enough if this clot was removed the hemorrhage would re-commence, and he would be powerless to stanch it.

Until medical aid could be obtained, it was best to leave this as it was.

Dick would have given much had he been able to ascertain more exactly the nature and extent of the wound.

His greatest apprehensions were excited by its position, which made him fear that the hurt was a mortal one.

He strove hard to think otherwise, and occupied himself by endeavouring to bring her back to reanimation.

But it was not until the fisherman had left the cottage for the purpose of getting the boat in readiness for launching that he succeeded.

Maud opened her eyes quietly and languidly.

Her gaze fell upon Dick's face, and her face lighted up with a faint smile.

She pressed his hand to show her thankfulness at finding him safe and apparently unhurt.

She was about to speak, but Dick checked her by a rapid gesture.

He was afraid that any attempt to exercise her voice would be attended with the worst and most dangerous results.

"Do not attempt to utter one syllable," he said, in low tones, but sufficiently loud for her to catch the purport of what he said. "Be satisfied for me to tell you that the danger is over, and that in a very short time all will be well—quite well."

Maud shook her head.

"Yes, yes! Believe me, I speak truly. We are even now about to embark for France. We are now in a cottage on the sea-coast. If you listen, you will hear the roaring of the breakers."

Again Maud seemed as though about to speak.

But Dick checked her once more.

"Silence is imperative," he said. "Once more I ask you to be content with my earnest assurance that all is well."

"No, no," she said, in a low, hurried whisper—"all is not well, Dick, for—for, Dick, I feel that I am dying."

"No, no!" Dick cried, with eager earnestness, though while he spoke his heart swelled so painfully as to be well-nigh past endurance. "You are weak and faint from loss of blood, I know; but that has ceased, and when we reach France medical aid can be had without fear of the result. Cheer up, dear one! A brighter and happier dawn is coming."

As he spoke, Maud felt that in one sense it might be so, but she offered no remark.

Indeed, the effort to speak as much as she had was so severe as to render her incapable of repeating it.

As for Dick himself, he was constrained to turn aside to conceal his emotions.

There was that on Maud's face which he could not bear to look upon.

It was something indescribable, yet he was innately conscious that the cause of the effect was the flappings of Death's sable pinions.

Fortunately for him, it was at this moment that the fisherman returned.

"Is all ready?" asked Dick, eagerly.

"Yes, quite."

"Then do not let us lose another moment."

The fisherman bade his wife a hasty, whispered adieu.

Dick partially raised Maud.

The fisherman came to his aid, and between them she was carried to the vessel.

The roughness of the ocean had now to a very considerable extent abated—a circumstance which did not fail to cause Dick sensations of great pleasure.

Still, it was what an old sailor would have called a "dirty" night.

The bark which was in readiness for them was small in size, and yet large when the fact that one man could work it was taken into consideration.

Maud was carried on board, and, as a matter of course, was made as comfortable as the nature of things permitted.

The next thing was to get Black Bess also aboard the craft, and had she not been so docile and so thoroughly obedient to her master's will, the task would have been one of no ordinary difficulty.

The fisherman was filled with wonder.

"Your horse seems to have as much intelligence as a Christian."

"She is worth her weight in gold," said Dick, caressing her fondly. "Had it not been for her to-night——"

He ceased, for he thought it would not be prudent to let the fisherman know too much.

All now was in readiness.

The boat was pushed off from the shore, and the fisherman climbed over the side.

A few strokes with the oar carried them fairly out on to the ocean, and then the task of hoisting the sail was commenced.

In this operation Dick was of great service.

"If this breeze continues," said the fisherman, "and all goes well, we shall make a speedier journey to France than has been heard of for many a year."

Dick looked around him, or, more correctly speaking, he endeavoured to do so.

But so intense was the darkness that the surface of the waves could scarce be distinguished.

Already the recently-left land had vanished altogether from their view, and as he tried unsuccessfully to pierce the gloom which hung before them like some velvet pall, Dick was indeed sensible of the amount of courage, skill, and daring requisite to enable anyone to undertake such a journey.

But the demeanour of the fisherman filled him with admiration, and at the same time inspired him with confidence.

Now that he was afloat, there was no eagerness or excitement about him.

He was as calm to all outward appearances as it was possible for a human being to be under any circumstances.

It was evident now that he thought nothing of the risk and danger of the undertaking, but bent all his energies towards bringing it to a successful termination.

When the sail was properly fixed, the motion of the vessel was much accelerated, and Dick found an opportunity of placing himself beside Maud.

She was shivering with cold.

His first care was to wrap her up still more effectually.

He could not see her face—the darkness was too great for that.

But he spoke reassuring words to her, and over and over again repeated that they were now free from all danger.

He could tell that his words were heard and understood by the occasional and feeble pressure of her hand.

The boat surged through the foaming water at a furious rate.

The fisherman was right when he said if the wind continued steadfast the passage would be a quick one.

At present it blew directly from the English coast, and as they carried quite as much, perhaps even more, sail than was exactly compatible with ordinary safety, and as the fisherman added to the velocity by working lustily at the oars, it may be believed that their rate of progress was sufficiently rapid.

And yet, despite this swiftness, Dick was full of all-devouring impatience.

This, however, was on Maud's account, which was enough to account for it.

Every moment Dick fancied she grew colder and colder, and he was inwardly conscious that her life was ebbing fast away, while he was powerless to arrest its departure.

Nothing could have shown more convincingly how perilous was her condition than the fact that up to the present moment she had not seemed to have observed the absence of Dick Turpin's comrades, on behalf of whom the reader will scarcely require to be told Dick himself experienced the utmost anxiety.

He feared, and feared truly, that things had gone hard with them.

Insensibly he was led to think of how strange it was that this stupendous catastrophe should have taken place at a moment when they felt most convinced of their own safety, and when they were all indulging in reflections upon the immunity from peril they were about to enjoy.

Of course, Dick was not so well informed as the reader is, and therefore he found it most difficult to think by what means the officers had been enabled so thoroughly to surprise them.

Things went on thus until, faintly and chilly, morning dawned upon the wide waste of waters.

Long before there was light enough in the east to enable any objects far away to be distinguished, Dick was standing up in the boat and looking earnestly in advance.

"We shall see land in a few minutes, Maud, dearest," he exclaimed, as the dawn brightened. "Cheer up, dear one, a little longer—only a little longer! The worst is over now, and assistance is close at hand. Do not—pray do not, for my sake, give way to despair! Believe me that you are safe."

A more convulsive pressure of his hand was all the reply which Maud was able to make to this speech.

Dick was in despair.

Again he bent down eagerly over her, looking into her countenance by the aid of the light which the dim gray dawn afforded.

This in itself was sufficient to impart to all objects a cold and ghastly appearance, so that it is not surprising that what he beheld should fill him with the most poignant grief.

Death-like indeed did her thin and pallid countenance appear.

Dick's heart swelled, and heavy drops of sorrow fell from his eyes.

Maud felt them.

Her eyes had hitherto been wearily closed, but now they opened.

Tears quickly rushed into them, obscuring all things, and again they closed.

Her lips parted with a faint, faint smile, which grieved Dick more to look upon than would the loudest manifestations of grief and pain.

Once more he sprang to his feet.

Once more shading his eyes with his hands, he looked keenly in advance.

An exclamation of joyfulness escaped him.

"Land—land," he cried—"land is in sight at last! Help now is at hand indeed!"

"Impossible," exclaimed the fisherman, drawing the oars into the boat.

"What is impossible?"

"Why, that land should be in sight."

"Come and look for yourself."

The fisherman came forward.

"You are right," he exclaimed. "I knew we had come swiftly, and yet I little thought that we were so near our journey's end. You have good cause to be thankful."

"I am indeed," replied Turpin, in heartfelt accents; "but yet every moment of time is precious."

"Maud, dearest," he added again, bending over her, "you heard me say that land is in sight? I can aid you best, and most truly show my love for you, by making every effort to increase our speed; I am about to leave you in order to assist the fisherman in rowing."

Dick turned away without giving Maud an opportunity to reply, or even to make a sign.

He took hold of one of the oars and prepared himself to use it.

"That's right!" said the fisherman. "It will make a wonderful difference."

As may be expected, Dick Turpin was not very expert in the use of the oar, but yet he handled it in such a manner as to elicit the fisherman's admiration.

But then Dick felt he was rowing for a life that he accounted ten times more precious than his own, and so his exertions are not to be wondered at.

Without Maud he felt he should indeed be a wreck—a waif, and an outcast from all humanity.

After her death life would be nothing more to him than a weary blank.

CHAPTER MLXX.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN LOSES HIS NEAREST, DEAREST, TRUEST FRIEND.

GRADUALLY the morning brightened.

Dick and the fisherman laboured incessantly.

Although the land appeared to be so close, it seemed a weary time until it was fairly reached.

As they drew near to it, Dick perceived a small collection of houses—too small for the place to be dignified by the name of village.

What place it was, he was too busily occupied with his own thoughts to inquire.

Such matters of detail were far beneath his notice now.

Just, however, as the sail was taken down, he said:

"Do you know of any person in this place who, by being well paid, would consent to receive us into a house?"

"I do know a poor widow, who lives in the end cottage yonder; it is a poor place, as you see."

"Quite good enough," interrupted Turpin, impatiently.

"Will she receive us?—that is the question. Is there a doctor at hand?"

"Yes."

"How far off?"

"Perhaps a league."

"Quick—quick!"

The fisherman now slightly changed the direction of his boat, so as to enable them to land nearer to the widow's cottage.

Dick's impatience and anxiety had now reached fever point.

Maud was quite insensible.

No sooner did the keel of the little vessel grate upon the beach than he seized her in his arms and jumped ashore.

Black Bess instantly followed him in the same way that a huge spaniel might have done.

The fisherman was amazed to see how easily Dick ran with Maud in his arms across the rough beach towards the widow's door, and not less so at seeing Black Bess following in his footsteps.

With all speed possible he made secure his boat.

Before he had finished doing so, Dick had gained admittance to the lowly dwelling.

The widow's kindly heart was at once touched.

As Dick was able to speak the French language sufficiently well to make himself understood, he had no difficu'ty in letting the widow know what he wanted.

Her kindly heart was at once touched both by his distress and Maud's dangerous-looking condition.

She consented instantly, and with pleased alacrity led the way to a small but clean inner chamber which was furnished as a bed-room.

Gently Maud was deposited upon the bed.

"Leave her to me a moment or so," said the widow; "she needs my attention. Do you at once hasten for the doctor."

Dick immediately withdrew.

On reaching the threshold he found himself confronted by the fisherman.

"How far did you say it was to the doctor's?" he asked.

"About a league."

"Do you know where he lives?"

"Yes."

"Then mount my mare—do not be afraid of her, she will carry you swiftly and safely. When you reach the doctor's let him mount her in your place and gallop back."

"I will."

"Tell him that life and death depend upon his speed, and assure him that he shall be amply recompensed for his trouble."

Fortunately, the fisherman knew how to ride.

Upon an ordinary occasion Black Bess would have suffered no one save her master to cross her back, nor would he have allowed anyone else to mount her.

But now he patted her, and made her clearly understand the nature of his wishes.

"Quiet, old girl," he said—"quiet and quick! You will render me another priceless service this day!"

The next moment the fisherman was off.

Dick watched them as long as he could keep them in sight.

Then, with swelling heart and tear-filled eye, he turned and re-entered the cottage.

The old woman emerged from the inner room.

"She has recovered her consciousness, and has asked for you."

Dick reached the bedside at one stride.

Maud's face was turned anxiously and expectantly towards the door, and it lighted up joyfully when she caught sight of Dick's well-known form.

He bent down over her and grasped her hand.

"Maud, dearest, we are absolutely safe at last—no one can touch us here. The doctor will arrive directly. He will see to your hurt, and then—why, then all will be well."

Dick's voice almost entirely failed him as he gave utterance to the hope which he could not feel.

Maud shook her head.

"No, no, Dick," she answered, in a whisper so faint that he had to strain his sense of hearing to the utmost to catch the purport of her words—"do not try to fill me with a hope which you do not experience yourself."

"Nay, I——"

"Hush, hush! Hear me, Dick—I am dying: yes, slowly, surely dying. You will tell me that I only fancy this; but, believe me, I have a feeling within me of such a nature as convinces me that I am not mistaken."

"But this—this is dejection. When the doctor sees you your feelings will undergo a total change."

Again Maud slowly shook her head.

"But while there is life there is hope," Dick murmured, scarcely knowing what he was saying, for he could not close his eyes to the conviction that Death was indeed hovering over her.

But yet the doctor might be able to save her.

That was his last hope, and he clung to it with pertinacity.

A deep silence ensued.

Maud had again closed her eyes.

The slight exertion involved in keeping them open seemed now to be too much for her.

Her breath, too, seemed only to be drawn in irregular, spasmodic gasps.

Oh, how anxiously Dick waited for the sound that would be made by Bess returning!

The old woman came to the threshold.

"Run to the outer door," said Dick. "Look out well for the doctor. You will see him coming on a black horse. The very moment you catch sight of him let me know."

The widow promised obedience, and as soon as her aged, weakened powers would let her, took up the required station.

More anxious time then passed.

At length, however, after weary waiting, Dick heard her cry:

"Here he comes—here he comes! My faith, the horse seems to fly!"

Dick uttered an ejaculation of deep thankfulness.

In little more than a minute afterwards the clattering of a horse's hoofs came upon his ears.

Louder and louder grew the sound, until it ceased suddenly at the outer door.

Dick hurried out.

A white-haired gentleman, attired in black, dismounted.

For once Black Bess was left unheeded by her master.

He dragged the doctor in, and, as he did so, he hoarsely whispered in his ear:

"Save her—save her! Restore her once more to herself, and you shall name your own reward!"

"I will do my best," was the reply.

Dick paused upon the threshold of the inner room, which the doctor entered in company with the poor widow.

Dick seemed stupified with his grief.

How long he would have stood there in the same immovable attitude, apparently unconscious of everything, is hard indeed to say, had he not been aroused by a low neigh.

He started, went outside, and for a time was enabled to distract his anguish by attending to his steed.

But it was not until an hour had elapsed that the doctor came forth.

His face looked grave and sad, and in its general expression was such as to extinguish all Dick's hopes.

Nevertheless, he hurried forward.

"Well—well," he said, "what is the result? Tell me quickly! I can bear anything better than suspense!"

The doctor shook his head gravely.

"My good sir," he said, "you must prepare your mind for the worst."

"The worst?"

"Yes."

"Is the wound a mortal one?"

"It is."

Dick groaned.

"Be calm—be calm. Obtain what command you can over yourself, and enter her room. You will have but a short time to pass together now."

Dick clasped his hands over his face, and gave way to a transport of frantic grief, which the doctor in vain endeavoured to check or mitigate.

But the storm of passion was too violent to last very long.

As he grew calmer the doctor talked gravely to him.

Much that he said fell upon unheedful ears.

"Tell me," said Dick, presently, calming himself by a terrible effort: "Is what you tell me the absolute truth?"

"It is indeed. It is absolutely impossible for any individual to recover from such injuries as she has sustained."

"And—and do you think, doctor, if she had had medical assistance sooner that——"

"I suppose you had it at the earliest moment?"

"Heaven knows I had, indeed!"

"Then it is in vain to speculate upon the consequences of anything that could not have happened."

Dick bowed his head.

He understood full well what was meant by the speech

Maud perhaps might have been saved had she received immediate surgical assistance.

This was, in truth, a most bitter thought for Dick, who would carry the reproach with him to the grave.

"You must not think of that," the doctor said, perceiving how deep was the impression he had made. "She told me you had done everything in the power of mortal man on her behalf. Linger here no longer, for, believe me, precious moments are flying fast."

"Is she, then—then really dy——".

A huge sob rose in the highwayman's throat and choked the word.

"She is," answered the doctor. "It would be false kindness to keep the knowledge from you."

The worst had now been made known, and Dick grew gradually calmer.

With some difficulty he prevailed upon the medical man to receive a small fee, for he declared that as he had done nothing, then nothing was his due.

With a heavy, faltering step, Dick made his way towards the threshold of Maud's room.

As he reached it her face again lighted up with the old smile, but on this occasion it caused Dick more anguish than a violent outburst of sorrow.

The next moment he was bending over her with her hand clasped in his.

For some moments he was mute, while Maud herself seemed too exhausted to utter a syllable.

Her lips parted, but no sound came from them.

In the silence, Dick could hear her painful and laboured attempt at respiration.

From the sound, it seemed as though the lungs had been seriously injured—too seriously for any hope of recovery to be indulged in.

"Dick," Maud faintly murmured, at length—"Dick, I have heard what the doctor has said; and even if I had not, your looks and my own feelings would have been sufficient to—to——"

"Nay, Maud," Dick cried, with a sudden outburst, for he could not trust himself to speak calmly, "I must and will believe that while there is life there is hope!"

"Then how slight must be your hope if you reckon it by the amount of life I have got now!" answered Maud, faintly. "No, no—I feel that at the most I have but a few minutes to live: let us make use of them in bidding each other a long farewell."

"And what will life be to me without you?" asked Dick, faintly, as he bent down yet lower over the humble couch.

Maud did not reply.

From her manner, it would seem as though she were endeavouring to pronounce the word "Farewell," but that utterance failed her.

Dick gazed again into her wan face.

Dim as his eyes were with burning tears, yet he could not help acknowledging that she was a true prophet.

There was that unmistakable hue spread over her whole countenance which proclaimed all too plainly that Death was hovering over her, and that in a brief space of time indeed he would let fall his fatal dart.

Maud vainly strove to speak.

The appearance of her countenance now filled the highwayman with dismay.

At length, by making what seemed to be almost a superhuman effort, Maud whispered a few words.

"Dick," she said, "I cannot see you, for the room is very dark; but kiss me once more, and say the word 'Farewell!' for we must part."

Dick pressed his lips upon hers with frantic vehemence.

At the same time Maud sighed deeply.

It was her last breath.

The lips grew cold like those of a corpse.

Still Dick did not rise.

He could not as yet realise that Maud had passed away from him and from the world for evermore.

It did not seem to him as though there could by any possibility come such a sudden termination, and so awful a one, to their long and loving companionship.

Dick never knew how long he thus remained.

The widow ventured to the door, and saw him in the position we have described, and, unwilling to disturb him, went away.

But hours and hours passed away without any sound coming from the inner room.

Then she grew alarmed, and her terror had reached its highest pitch when the doctor made his appearance.

Business had brought him near, and so he had entered, thinking perhaps he might be of some service.

In his company, the widow entered the little bedchamber.

Maud was then found quite dead, and Dick beside her, apparently dead also.

But the highwayman was only in a swoon.

The doctor recovered him; and, although life returned, yet his patient was in a high fever, and raging in delirium.

The cause of this was quickly found.

Dick had been wounded, as we have said.

The quantity of blood he had lost was immense, and the excitement he had suffered had brought on inflammation.

The doctor shook his head.

"We shall have a hard case here," he said. "I never saw an uglier-looking place in my life."

But, fortunately, Dick had fallen into good hands.

Unwearied was the care bestowed upon him.

In spite of it, however, he still remained delirious.

Strange indeed were the words to which he gave utterance in his ravings; and had he been in England, they would infallibly have led to his detection.

As it was, he spoke in English, and it so happened that the widow and the worthy doctor were entirely unacquainted with the language.

As money was found in his pockets, and as, after the lapse of three days, he evinced no signs of returning sense, Maud was buried in the little churchyard close at hand.

It was sad indeed to think that there should only be strangers to perform for her the last offices rendered to the dead.

There was no chief mourner by the grave when the coffin containing her remains was lowered into it.

But when the ceremony was concluded, and the earth was filled in, scarcely a dry eye could have been found in all the group that had assembled, for in that lonely spot on the sea-shore it was a rare occurrence for a stranger to be buried.

Had she been conscious of it, Maud would have had the satisfaction of knowing that, although in a foreign land, she had not been lowered into the grave unmourned and unregretted.

And as the people slowly dispersed they looked towards the widow's humble habitation, and whispered that in all probability no long time would elapse before they were called forth to witness another funeral.

And so passed away all that was mortal of the fond and faithful wife of Dick Turpin, the highwayman.

CHAPTER MLXXI.

RETURNS TO SIXTEEN-STRING JACK, AND RELATES WHAT TOOK PLACE UPON HIS ARRIVAL AT NEWGATE.

ONCE more we take the reader back to the dismal old prison of Newgate.

It will be remembered that we left Sixteen-String Jack at the moment when the hackney-coach came to a standstill at its destination.

As the vehicle had crawled along so slowly the reader may make sure that the crowd which started from Bow Street considerably augmented in size after having passed through the principal streets of the metropolis.

By the time the prison was gained it had swelled to a bulk that excited considerable consternation in the breasts of Mr. Skellum and his assistants, for they apprehended a rescue.

Before, then, any attempt whatever was made to release Jack from the hackney-coach, the police officers placed themselves more densely round it, and so formidable was their force that they could undoubtedly have repelled a very serious onslaught.

But these precautions were all superfluous.

It did not seem as though the mob contemplated any aggressive movement.

They were content to remain spectators of the scene that was about to ensue.

While these steps were being taken, due notice was given at the portal of the prison that a prisoner of no ordinary importance had arrived.

Accordingly the door was opened by the man on the look, and, at the suggestion of Mr. Skellum, all the available men on duty were summoned from their respective posts to the vestibule.

[THE DISCOVERY OF CLAUDE DUVAL.]

As at Bow Street, those police officers who were not packed round the coach were drawn up in a double lane, so as thoroughly to protect the prisoner during his brief passage from the one door to the other.

Of course, Jack could not help seeing all these precautions, and as he gazed he could not forbear smiling, for he had made up his mind not to attempt to escape under such hopeless circumstances as the present.

For this reason, all this superextra care seemed to him ridiculous.

At length all the preparations were complete, and then, and not till then, Mr. Skellum gave the signal for opening the door of the hackney-coach.

Jack was almost stifled, for the uncomfortable vehicle had been crammed with police officers to the fullest extent of its capacity.

These now alighted, leaving the prisoner, about whom they were so solicitous, perfectly helpless and motionless.

"All's ready," said Skellum. "Take hold, and carry him quick. I shall be glad when that part of the business is fairly over."

The command was obeyed with all imaginable promptitude.

Several of the strongest of the police officers lifted him up in their arms, and literally carried him across the pavement and up the steps into the vestibule of the prison.

Then, no sooner was the threshold crossed than the door was closed by Mr. Skellum himself, who gave utterance to an audible sigh of relief as he performed the operation.

No. 233 will be Published next Monday.

Evidently he looked upon his tightly-bound prisoner as being many degrees safer than before.

An ordinary spectator would have been much amazed to see so many strong and well-armed men intent solely upon the safe custody of one who seemed the slimmest of the whole party.

Yet such was the extraordinary spectacle which the vestibule of Newgate presented.

Mr. Skellum next made his way towards the Governor, who was the successor to the man who had held the office at the time the highwaymen paid their last visit.

This present Governor had formerly been in the army, and in consequence he had created something resembling the discipline of a garrison in the prison.

"You see, Major Oneyer," said Skellum, with a half bow, "I have brought you a prisoner of some distinction, and I hope you will do the State good service by keeping him in safe custody."

"You may depend," answered the Governor, gruffly, and curling his huge moustache as he spoke—"you may depend that nothing on my part will be wanting."

"I am sure of it. Here are my necessary papers, please take them, and let me have the ordinary receipt in return."

The Governor scowled fearfully at the documents, and complied with the request just made.

"Of course," said Skellum, as he pocketed the important paper—"of course my duty properly ends here; but still, as I have more than ordinary interest in the safe custody of the prisoner, I will, with your consent, remain here and see him conveyed to his cell."

"I—I know my duty, sir!" said the major, drawing himself up to his full height, and assuming as much importance as he was able.

"I do not for a moment doubt it," said Skellum, with servile humbleness; "but still, as it would afford me very great satisfaction, I trust you will not refuse me the request."

"Well—well, I suppose not."

"Thank you, major; and if at any time I can be of service to you do not fail to command me."

The major turned on his heels with ill-concealed contempt expressed upon his countenance.

"Let the blacksmith come forward there at once!"

A door was opened, and the command repeated by one of the turnkeys, who shouted it down a passage with as much vigour as his lungs would permit.

A moment elapsed, and then a heavy, clattering, clanging sound was heard.

Jack could not resist the temptation of turning his head to ascertain the cause of it.

Directly afterwards the prison smith made his appearance.

He carried in one hand a large and heavy basket of tools, while behind him he dragged some unusually massive fetters, which certainly must have weighed at least two hundredweight.

The throng divided so as to allow this personage to come close to the prisoner.

Depositing the fetters with a hideous clatter, the blacksmith produced from his basket a portable anvil, which, with great care, he placed in a convenient position upon the stone floor of the vestibule.

His other implements were then produced, and laid ready to hand.

These preliminaries being over, the next proceeding was to invest Jack with his heavy irons.

In order that this might be done, it was necessary entirely to remove the other bonds by which he was secured.

This was a proceeding which Mr. Skellum viewed with the utmost trepidation.

He was fearful lest in some most mysterious and unaccountable way his prisoner should escape.

Accordingly he placed himself directly in front of Jack, and then pulled from his pocket a horse-pistol, the largeness of which was enough to make anyone shudder.

A more bloodthirsty, death-dealing looking weapon could scarcely be conceived.

"Now, Mr. Sixteen-String Jack," Skellum said, as he deliberately cocked his pistol, "I hope you see this pleasant little friend of mine. Take my word for it, it is heavily loaded, and at this distance I can cover your brain nicely. So! You quite understand? Now, unless you permit these men to remove your present bonds, and substitute these fetters, without so much as raising a finger in resistance, I will pull the trigger and blow your brains out without the least remorse!"

There could be no mistaking the earnestness of the speaker, and at the moment he looked more like some fiend than a human creature.

These words seemed to strike the Governor dumb.

Such an interference with his authority he had never before experienced, and he could scarcely credit the reality of what had occurred.

But the attitude of Skellum left no room for doubt or incredulity.

The major's moustache seemed actually to bristle up.

"Sir," he ejaculated, hoarsely—"Mr. Skinem, or whatever you call yourself—do you know, sir, that this interference with one of my prisoners is insufferable, sir?—yes, and intolerable, sir! I repeat the word intolerable, sir! and rest assured that Major Oneyer is not the man to permit it! D—n me, no, sir!"

Mr. Skellum never moved.

"Sir," said the major, more wrathful still, and stalking towards him as he spoke—"sir, do you hear me?"

"Certainly I do."

"Then I tell you I will not suffer this."

"You cannot help yourself."

"Not help myself?"

"No, sir. Just look at that."

The major snatched from Skellum's hand a small piece of paper.

He glanced at it savagely.

"You see," said Skellum, still retaining his position, "the chief magistrate at Bow Street, acting under the direction of the Secretary of State, has thought fit to give me absolute control over the prisoner, so let us have no more fuss. If he stands quiet all will be well."

"Well, do you call it?" cried the Governor, furiously. "Let me tell you that I think it anything but well! This interference with a man who knows how to perform his duty, and one who has been an officer, is—is—yes, d—n me, sir!—is outrageous! But I know what I'll do—I'll sell out; no, no, I mean I'll resign, and have no more to do with a parcel of d—d, cowardly thief-takers!"

Mr. Skellum did not allow himself to be moved in the least by the fury of the Governor.

Just as though not a word had been uttered, he stood in the position which he had formerly taken up, for the operation of removing Jack's bonds had commenced.

As for the highwayman himself, the calmness which he manifested was only rivalled by that of Skellum.

It was by no means a comfortable thing to stand as Jack did within a couple of yards of the muzzle of a murderous-looking horse-pistol; but our old friend never moved a muscle.

But the officers were by no means so unapprehensive of the weapon, and every now and then they paused in their work to throw a glance at their superior officer, for they knew full well that in the event of the discharge of the pistol they could scarcely hope to escape very serious injury.

Finding that their prisoner continued to stand so calmly had in a short time the effect of infusing a feeling of much greater confidence into their hearts.

Their own impression was that Mr. Skellum's pistol had awed him into complete submission.

But, as we have already remarked, Jack had no intention of making any resistance at present, for he was fully conscious that it would not serve to better his condition in the least.

Still, it was not without a great inward struggle that he suffered himself to be loaded with the heavy fetters, which had been provided for his express accommodation.

The task of riveting them on was soon performed, for the blacksmith was well skilled in his duties.

"There," he said, with an air of satisfaction, as soon as he had finished, and retiring a few steps while he spoke in order that he might contemplate his handywork, "I don't think you will get rid of that amount of jewellery so easily as some that you have been provided with. Those fetters have not been used by anyone since the time when they were used for Jonathan Wild."

Skellum did not pay any attention to this speech.

When he saw his prisoner loaded with such a mass of iron-work that it was only by an exertion of great strength that he was able to stand upright he felt satisfied.

He uncocked his pistol, and slipped it into his huge side pocket.

All the while the smith had been at work he had watched him with a keen and critical eye, and from what he had formerly seen of such matters, he felt confident that there was not one faulty place in all the irons.

The Governor's looks bespoke his inward fury, and he still stood looking on, engaged in curling the ends of his moustache.

Evidently, he now expected that Skellum would take his departure; but that individual still lingered, being most unwilling to lose sight of his important capture.

"Major," he said, at length, "I don't think you ought to be so glumpish over this business. You don't know how much I have at stake in it."

The Governor did not speak.

Skellum continued:

"I have only one more favour to ask of you, and after that I will willingly take my departure. It is, that you will allow me to see the prisoner conveyed to his cell."

"Favour be d—d, sir!" returned the Governor, in a tone of voice which showed his wrath to be as great as ever. "Haven't you an infernal slip of paper, sir, that sets my authority at naught?"

Mr. Skellum said nothing further, but looked upon this last speech as granting his request.

One of the turnkeys came forward, and in respectful tones asked which cell the prisoner should occupy.

"Don't make a d—n fool of yourself by asking me!" was the major's reply. "Ask him. I wash my hands of the entire matter."

Skellum was evidently tolerably familiar with the interior of the prison of Newgate; for upon the turnkey looking towards him, he said, unhesitatingly:

"No. 54."

The man stared and looked towards the major, who, however, refused to take any notice of his glance.

"Do you hear me?" Skellum cried.

"Yes; but——"

"None of your buts to me, sirrah! No. 54, I tell you."

The turnkey hung up the bunch of keys which he had taken in his hand in readiness, and, going to the wall, took down another bunch which, judging by the mingled rust and dust that had accumulated upon them, had not been used for many a day.

Indeed, the turnkey's hesitation only arose from the fact that the series of cells of which No. 54 formed one, had never, to his knowledge, been made use of.

In fact, No. 54 was situated in a portion of the old building, and its position was much below the ordinary level of the cells.

He had, however, nothing to do but obey; so, having taken the fresh bunch of keys in hand, he led the way out of the vestibule.

A procession was immediately formed, and so arranged that Sixteen-String Jack should form the centre of it.

So great was the weight of the irons, that, added to the pain of his wound, he was scarcely able to move.

Still he was unwilling to confess as much to his foes, and staggered on in the best way he could.

The distance was great.

The corridors threaded and the steps descended seemed innumerable.

At length a door was reached which for a long time defied the powers of the officers to open it.

At length, however, it receded upon its hinges, disclosing another flight of steps—damp-shining steps.

Care had to be taken in descending these, and Jack was glad to avail himself of the proffered aid of two of the turnkeys.

At the bottom of the flight of steps a long corridor extended, the atmosphere of which was sickening and most oppressive to the lungs.

After going about half-way along it the turnkey stopped.

"This is No. 54," he said. "Wait a moment, and I will find the key."

CHAPTER MLXXII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK BECOMES THE INMATE OF NO. 54.

THE lamp which the turnkey carried burnt very dimly in that damp, subterraneous passage, the confined atmosphere of which was most unpleasant to the lungs; and he was obliged to look very closely at the bunch of keys in order to find the one which fitted the lock of No. 54.

Skellum looked on impatiently.

Each key had attached to it a small piece of metal, on which was stamped one or two figures denoting the number of the cell to which they belonged.

"Here it is, sir," said the turnkey, at length, fixing upon one particular key. "And by the looks, I should think it has been a precious long time since it has been used."

"Never mind your thoughts," interrupted Skellum—"nobody here wants to hear them! Be quick and open the door!"

Growling out something in a suppressed voice, the man obeyed.

But it was not very easy to make the huge key turn in the wards of the ponderous lock.

At last, however, the bolt was shot back, the heavy crossbar removed, and the door pushed open.

The turnkey raised his lamp above his head, and, standing on the threshold, peeped in.

"Enter!" said Skellum. "Do you think we want to stay here all night?"

With more muttered execrations about Skellum's officiousness, the man complied with this new demand.

That he was quite right in saying a very long time must have elapsed since the cell had been used was proved by the first glance which was cast around.

The floor was covered with moist, sticky dirt, while the walls fairly shone with watery exhalations.

Huge poisonous-looking fungi grew in the dark corners, where they found a congenial soil.

The mere aspect of such a place as this was quite enough to strike a chill to the heart of the bravest man.

How much more dreadful must it then have been to contemplate a lengthened solitary sojourn in it!

In spite of the stern control which he had hitherto exercised over himself, the highwayman shuddered.

Those who were with him shuddered too, but probably the cold was the cause of the spasmodic movement.

Mr. Skellum was in no humour to linger.

He walked straight to the further end of the cell.

The floor here was rather higher than elsewhere, and the consequence was that it was not so damp and disagreeable.

The first object which attracted the prisoner's attention was a broad stone bench.

Just below this was a strong iron bar raised about three inches from the flooring, to which it was strongly secured at both ends.

If Jack had been in any doubt as to the uses to which this long iron bar was put, these doubts would soon have had an end.

Another turnkey advanced, carrying in his hand a huge padlock and key.

From Jack's waist depended some strong iron links, which were connected by means of a ring with the fetters which confined his wrists.

This again was joined by the fetters round his ankles.

The turnkey took hold of the iron ring we have mentioned and passed through it the bow of the padlock, which he afterwards clasped round the horizontal iron bar.

The key was turned and removed.

The highwayman was then considered to be a secure prisoner.

Mr. Skellum attentively watched all these proceedings with strong sensations of satisfaction.

As for Jack, he was so much exhausted, not merely with the weight of the fetters, but also with the fatigue and weakness caused by remaining so long tightly bound, that he very gladly sank upon the stone bench, offering no resistance at all to his foes.

This passiveness was the only thing that caused Skellum any anxiety.

He looked upon it as being altogether an unfavourable symptom, and he hoped that the prison officials would not suffer themselves to be deluded by it.

The reader will comprehend that the mode in which the highwayman was fastened allowed him a certain amount of liberty, inasmuch as he could, if he chose, walk the whole length of the iron bar, which was so constructed that the bow of the padlock could slip along it easily.

Jack at once bent his eyes upon the ground, and by his appearance seemed to be altogether unconscious of the fact that he was not alone.

When all was completed, Mr. Skellum stood for some moments looking at him.

But he could not take his departure until he had satisfied himself that Jack was secure.

He did this by making a careful examination of the fetters.

Of this also Jack seemed to be unconscious, for he never moved a muscle.

The fact was that he was in a state closely resembling insensibility.

He was too much overcome to make the slightest motion, and he was only partly conscious of what was going on around.

And when we consider what our old friend had gone through, no surprise will be felt at the helpless condition to which he was reduced.

At last Skellum signified his readiness to depart; but as he went he continued to cast anxious glances towards his prisoner.

With the closest attention he watched the turnkey secure the door, and as he walked back along the gloomy passage he said:

"Do not for one moment suffer yourselves to be deceived by the apathy of the prisoner; I am convinced that it is only assumed, and of course only with the intention of throwing you off your guard."

The turnkeys were silent, for there was not one who relished this interference with their duties.

"If you are wise you will pay attention to what I have said," continued Skellum. "The Government is determined to hang this man; and should he escape, depend upon it every one who has any share in keeping guard over him will be transported."

Still there was no reply, and this persistent silence made Skellum grind his teeth with rage.

Moodily he stalked on until the vestibule was once more reached, and then he looked around him as though he had anticipated to see the Governor.

But the major had retired.

Skellum, having no excuse for remaining longer, reluctantly took his departure.

On the pavement outside he paused, however, and assembled his men around him.

"I have no faith in the present Governor of Newgate, nor in one of the officials, so that, to counteract their carelessness, you shall form a close circle round the prison, and keep a sharp look-out upon every part of it. Perform this service well, and you shall be well rewarded. Never fear but that I will see to that."

The men separated, and Skellum retraced his steps to Bow Street.

He was now full of anxiety to learn something about the movements of those who had started off in pursuit of the remainder of the band of highwaymen.

But on his arrival there was no intelligence, and this circumstance had the effect of filling his mind with painful doubts.

He began to think that they had not met with much success, or he would have heard of them sooner.

We fancy, however, that the reader would prefer a relation of what happened to Jack to the proceedings of the police officers, and accordingly we return to Newgate.

The Governer was a long time before he could bring his furious anger into anything like reasonable bounds.

This superseding of his authority was something which his haughty nature could not brook.

His first act was to take pen, ink, and paper as soon as he could recover himself sufficiently to do so.

In very intemperate language he then wrote out his resignation of the office he held, and concluded with the suggestion that, as so much confidence was felt in Mr. Skellum's abilities, he had better be put in his place.

This missive he immediately despatched by special messenger; and having done so, he felt much more composed than he had hitherto done.

We mention these circumstances because of the effect which they produced upon Sixteen-String Jack's condition.

Every night it was the custom of the major to make a complete round of the prison, so as to insure that all was going on as it should be.

He did not allow his passion to prevent him from making the present evening any exception to the rule.

The usual round was taken, and when he had finished he said, in surly tones:

"And where the devil, may I ask, is No. 54?"

The turnkey explained the position of the cell.

"I suppose I may be allowed to visit this cell too? But the devil burn me, if the time will not soon be here when I shall not know what to do in the prison. Lead the way, will you?" he added, to the jailer. "Don't stand there like a grinning idiot, as you are!"

The man, without a word, conducted the major to No. 54, for he knew very well that it was a most unwise proceeding to offer the choleric Governor any provocation in his present angry mood.

"And this is the place they have thought fit to put a fellow-man and a Christian in, is it?" said the major, as he paused before the door of Jack's cell. "Faugh!—bah! the stink is enough to kill a regiment of soldiers!"

The turnkey opened the door.

The grating sound caused Jack to look up.

He wondered greatly what could be the meaning of this unexpected visitor.

The Governor stalked up close to the damp, moss-grown bench on which our old friend sat.

For some moments he looked on in silence, but at last his thoughts broke forth in words.

"May I be d—d!" he ejaculated, "if this is not worse than the Black Hole at Calcutta! It's a disgrace! But," he added, with a string of oaths which we prefer to omit, "it shall never be said that Major Oneyer permitted such a state of things to exist. You may be a bad sort of a fellow, but d—n me, sir, if you shall be treated like a beast!"

Sixteen-String Jack listened to these remarks in unbounded amazement.

In vain he tried to comprehend their exact purport.

It was not long, however, before he found that the disagreement between the major and Mr. Skellum would be beneficial to himself.

"Give me the lamp," said the major, furiously; "and now go and fetch some one to help you. I will stop here and keep guard the while."

"And what is to be done, sir?" the turnkey ventured to inquire.

"Done!" echoed the major. "Why, this d—d hole shall be cleaned out, and made as comfortable as possible. Don't stare at me. It shall be done, and, harkye: order a fresh mattress to be brought and placed upon that stone bench. Why, it is damp enough to kill anyone who sat on it—and bring blankets, too, and a loaf."

The turnkey departed, anxious to communicate to his companions the extraordinary commands which he had received.

During his absence, the Governor walked up and down the cell, the fever in his mind being too great to allow him to remain still.

At the same time he occupied himself with pouring maledictions upon Skellum's head.

But as soon as Jack could recover from his astonishment he spoke:

"I don't know, sir," he said, in an unsteady voice, for the unexpected kindness of the Governor went to his heart—"I don't know why you should trouble yourself so much about my condition; but rest assured that I am deeply grateful to you for your humanity. I was always poor in expressing my thanks, but never poorer than I am at this moment."

"Never mind about that," said the Governor; "I am a soldier, and have got my own notions of what is right and wrong. It is certain that I was never cut out to be the Governor of a prison, and d—n me if I will be, and that's the truth! As for that Skinem or Killem, or whatever the blackguard's name is, I only wish I had the power to keep him in this place a week or two!"

What more the major may have said we know not, for just then the turnkey, accompanied by three others, appeared.

The men set about their task with hearty goodwill, for they knew the angry nature of the Governor; and in much less time than would perhaps have been thought possible, the cell was cleaned and made to present a widely different aspect.

A new mattress was placed upon the stone bench, and a couple of blankets were placed at the disposal of the prisoner.

Bread was brought, and also a pitcher of water.

"There, Mr. Skinem," the major ejaculated, when all his commands had been thoroughly carried out, "I have disappointed your base-hearted spite, and be d—d to you!"

These words of course let Sixteen-String Jack into the full light of the affair, and he comprehended it was the desire for revenge upon the man who had offended, more than humanity, that had induced the Governor to adopt his present course.

But this did not prevent the highwayman from expressing his gratitude for the amelioration of his condition.

In this, however, the major manifested his bluntness and honesty.

"Don't thank me," he roared, drowning Jack's voice completely. "You have nothing to thank me for."

"But I easily might have something," Jack answered.

"What do you mean?"

"Simply this, sir: I have been wounded in the leg by a bullet — somewhere near the ankle, I believe—and I should never forget your kindness if you were to send the surgeon to look at it. Your kindness has touched me, for when I entered this place I made up my mind to die rather than ask for assistance."

The major remained standing stock still for several seconds after the prisoner had finished speaking.

The first use which he made of his voice was to launch out into a volley of imprecations upon Skellum's inhumanity.

"And so you are a wounded man?" he said, at length, in a calmer voice.

"I am."

"And a brave one too," added the major. "What an infernal pity it is you did not turn soldier instead of highwayman. If you had, d—n me, sir, you would have been a credit to the country!"

The major spoke with so much emphasis as to call up a smile upon Jack's countenance.

"You shall have a surgeon in less than a quarter of an hour," he continued; "and as for the rascal Killem, I'll be even with him some day, the blackguard!"

CHAPTER MLXXIII.

THE RESULT OF SIXTEEN-STRING JACK'S TRIAL AT THE OLD BAILEY.

The Governor was as good as his word.

The surgeon came, who made an examination of Jack's hurt, which he pronounced not serious, but still in a bad state through neglect.

One dressing, however, had the effect of almost entirely relieving Jack from the smarting pain which he had suffered.

This being over, the highwayman threw himself at full length upon the hard mattress, and fell off into a profound sleep, which was solely caused by utter exhaustion.

He was awoke by hearing the fastenings of his cell door undone.

He looked up faintly and wearily.

A smile of pleasure immediately appeared upon his lips when he saw upon the threshold the young lawyer, Mr. Godfrey.

He came at once to the rude pallet and seated himself upon it.

"You have been sent by Old Matthew?" said Jack, inquiringly.

The lawyer nodded.

"My best thanks to him," answered Jack, "but he can do me no service. I feel that my race is run. I shall take the will for the deed, however. Assure him of my gratitude."

"I will, never fear. But I shall appear in your behalf at the trial, when, rest certain, every effort will be made to get you off."

"But made in vain."

"Nay—I don't know that."

"But I do."

"You are most despondent."

"I am; for I feel that my case is hopeless."

"Nay—nay—do not begin to despair yet."

"When is the trial?"

"In two days."

"So soon?"

"Yes. I shall try to get it postponed to next sessions."

"You will not succeed."

"You must allow me to judge best about that."

"Nay—nay; believe me, I realise much better than you do the exact nature of my position."

"You may think so."

"I am certain of it. I am in the toils, and I have set the authorities too long at defiance to indulge in any hope of getting off."

"You will think differently soon."

Jack shook his head.

"I am not surprised at your dejection; this place is enough to give anyone the horrors."

"Right—but what did you think of doing for me at the trial?"

"Getting up an alibi."

"Won't do."

"We shall see about that," said Mr. Godfrey, smiling. "I have had some little experience in these matters."

"And you really hope to succeed?"

"I do, because I shall bring witnesses forward to prove you were elsewhere."

"It will be useless."

"It will be done, nevertheless."

"Have you heard anything of my friends?"

"Nothing."

"There has been no fresh capture made?"

"I believe not."

"Then I have hopes for them. And now I wish you to pay the utmost attention to something I am going to say to you."

"I shall do so, never fear," answered Mr. Godfrey, taking out his note-book.

"Nay, it is nothing you have occasion to write down—merely listen."

"I will."

"About the trial, then, I have no doubts. I know full well how that will terminate."

"But——"

"Nay, no interruptions. After it is over I believe that my comrades will endeavour to rescue me, and will doubtless put themselves into communication with Old Matthew before doing so."

"Well?"

"Should they do so, take to them from me the assurance that it is my earnest desire that they will attempt nothing of the kind——"

"But stay——"

"Hush! The attempt cannot benefit me, for it will fail; and as for my comrades, they will perish."

"Really," cried Mr. Godfrey, "you take too gloomy a view of things, and you will not allow me to interpose a word."

"Promise me," continued Jack, unheedful of the interruption—"promise me that you will faithfully deliver this message. It is my last request, and I shall suffer much if it is not granted."

"You may depend that I will report all that you say. At the same time, endeavour to assume a little cheerfulness. Every effort will be made for you——"

"I know all about that, and I am deeply thankful to you all. But what I have seen since I have been an inmate of this prison convinces me that the Government will never allow me to slip through their fingers this time; the precautions taken are extraordinary."

"Still that ought not to make you despair."

"Why?"

"Because the race is not always to the swift, you know, and therefore it is possible for these extra precautions to defeat themselves."

"It may be so, but it is a frail hope indeed."

"Still it is a hope; and now let me give you one word of parting counsel, for the time allotted for my interview has almost expired. When you are brought up, plead not guilty, and leave the rest to me. Promise me to open your mouth."

"I promise that readily."

"Enough. I must now bid you farewell."

In fact, it was at this moment that the turnkey who had been standing near the door came towards them and gruffly announced:

"Time's up."

With a few more words of encouragement the young lawyer departed, and Jack was once more left to the solitude of his cell.

The visit, however, caused rather an increase than an abatement of Jack's despair.

A deep gloom seemed gradually settling upon his spirits.

It was because his heart was oppressed by a heavy presentiment.

An inward voice seemed perpetually to assure him that he had seen his faithful comrades for the last time, and that the duration of his life upon this earth would now be short indeed.

To what extent these dismal forebodings were correct, time now will very quickly show.

After the interview we have just recorded, nothing took place to disturb the monotony of existence that was of a character sufficiently important to merit particular consideration at our hands.

The two days mentioned by Mr. Godfrey as intervening between the one appointed for his trial quickly passed away.

The eventful morning came.

It found Sixteen-String Jack quite calm and composed.

He was like one who knows the worst—not like one enduring the liveliest suspense.

It was evident that the authorities were apprehensive that a rescue would be attempted, and therefore every conceivable precaution was adopted.

Jack's fetters weighed heavily upon him, preventing him from taking that amount of repose which his exhausted condition required.

Consequently it was with satisfaction that he looked forward to the commencement of his trial, because during it he fully expected to be relieved from the ponderous mass of iron.

But this expectation was doomed to disappointment.

To his unbounded astonishment, he was informed that it had been determined to place him in the dock with his fetters still upon him.

Jack uttered no word of remonstrance, because he knew full well that it would be unavailing.

But he looked upon this circumstance as a strong confirmation of his gloomy anticipations.

It was determined that he should perish.

His trial would be a mere idle form—an utter mockery.

He felt that he was foredoomed, and knew that the verdict and sentence were already decided.

It was, however, quite an unexpected thing for any prisoner to be placed at the bar while encumbered with his fetters, and a murmur of astonishment, not to say indignation, made itself heard as soon as the highwayman was brought into Court.

But this manifestation was speedily checked, for the spectators felt that they were only there out of sufferance, and that any misbehaviour would result in immediate expulsion.

Some compassion was, however, displayed for Jack's state of weakness, and, by the order of the presiding judge, he was provided with a chair.

Into this Jack sank gladly, and prepared to listen to what was about to take place, though with a strengthened consciousness of what the result would be.

The usual formalities attendant upon the opening of the Court were then gone through.

The jury were sworn, and the indictment against the prisoner read.

Stripped of all its confusing technicalities and needless repetitions, the substance was that at a certain time and place the prisoner at the bar did stop on the highway two of his Majesty's subjects, whom, after putting them in great fear of their lives, he despoiled of a large sum of money.

In accordance with the instructions given him, Jack, when called upon, pleaded "Not guilty."

Mr. Godfrey then rose.

"My lord," he said, "I beg to state that the prisoner is unprepared with his defence. It is now only three days since his examination, and the time has not been sufficient for the obtainment of the witnesses who will declare his innocence. For this reason I have to request that the trial be postponed until the next sessions, by which time the prisoner will be prepared."

No sooner had the last words left the young lawyer's lips than the counsel for the prosecution sprang to his feet.

"My lord," he said, "I beg to oppose the application of my learned friend. I maintain that sufficient time has elapsed in order to enable the prisoner to arrange his defence. Moreover, as I need not inform your lordship, the prisoner is one of a notorious band of desperadoes who have long set the authorities at defiance. With great difficulty this one has been captured, and any postponement of his trial would only afford facilities for his escape."

"Without taking the latter into consideration at all," replied the judge, "I deem the former objection quite valid. Sufficient time has elapsed, and the trial must now proceed."

This was Mr. Godfrey's first discomfiture.

But he had expected it, and, therefore, suffered but little disappointment.

His next effort was to rid Jack of his fetters.

"I bow to your decision, my lord, but I have yet another request to make. You see that the prisoner at the bar is loaded with fetters of such an enormous weight that it is quite wonderful how he sustains himself in them. My request is that, during the examination which is about to take place, the fetters be removed."

"My lord," interposed the counsel for the prosecution, "I must also oppose this application. We have good reason for believing that an attempt will be made to rescue the prisoner from custody, and therefore it has been deemed advisable to depart from the usual course, and cause the prisoner to appear before you as you see him."

The judge inclined his head.

"I consider the reason given by my learned friend for the prosecution quite sufficient," he said, "and I cannot make any interference."

Mr. Godfrey looked really disappointed this time, for he had quite calculated on carrying this point.

Those in the Court exchanged whispers with each other.

The general impression was that Jack's fate was sealed.

No very far-sighted person was required to see that the prosecution would have it all their own way, and that so far as the ultimate result was concerned, all the debates of the trial might as well be dispensed with.

The counsel for the prosecution now again rose.

Amid a breathless silence he commenced his address.

In a very circumstantial manner he related how the two bailiffs had been robbed on the high-road by Sixteen-String Jack.

As all the particulars of this adventure must be fresh in the minds of the reader, it is needless for us to report his speech in full.

His concluding words, however, may as well be put on record.

"Gentlemen of the jury," he said,—"this is a brief statement of the facts of the case against the prisoner. Witnesses will now be called who will depose to all the circumstances; and, having heard this evidence, it will be for you, gentlemen of the jury, to decide whether the prisoner at the bar is guilty or not. If the former, do not hesitate to pronounce your verdict, because it is only by making an example of such a man as the prisoner at the bar that we can hope to restore something like safety to his Majesty's subjects while travelling. The state of our high-roads has long been a disgrace to the whole land, and therefore, gentlemen of the jury, you will be able to see that your duty is more than ordinarily important upon the present occasion."

These last words were considered so unfair and so prejudicial that they were greeted with a general hiss from the body of the Court.

A scene of great confusion then ensued, and it was some moments before order could be restored.

In the meanwhile one of the witnesses had been placed in the box.

It was one of the bailiffs.

As soon as he had been sworn, he gave a very clear and truthful account of the manner in which he had been robbed.

He swore positively that Sixteen-String Jack was one of his assailants, and added over and over again, with great emphasis, that he could not possibly be mistaken in the matter.

Mr. Godfrey subjected him to a very close and searching cross-examination.

It was all to no purpose, however.

The man kept pertinaciously to his tale.

The other bailiff gave corroborative evidence, and then a whole army of police officers and other persons were marshalled successively into the witness-box.

They were called by the prosecution, and with the sole object of identifying the prisoner.

Every one swore most positively that the prisoner at the bar was no other than the famous highwayman, Sixteen-String Jack.

The bill offering the reward was then handed in.

Upon this, as the reader knows, was printed a description of Jack's appearance.

This was found to tally in every respect, so that the question of identification seemed settled beyond all possibility of doubt.

The evidence was overwhelming; but yet Mr. Godfrey did not despair.

He had his witnesses well and carefully instructed, and now he proceeded to call them.

Their evidence was that the prisoner at the bar was not Sixteen-String Jack, but a person who unfortunately bore a strong resemblance to him, and that at the time mentioned as that when the robbery was committed, he was many miles from the place.

The Old Bailey has long had an infamous notoriety for hard swearing, and surely never was harder swearing known than on the present occasion.

To the uninitiated it would have appeared difficult to come to a decision in the face of so much opposite and conflicting testimony.

But the jury, when the time came for them to deliberate upon their verdict, did not so much as turn round in their seats.

Their minds were quite made up, and when the Clerk of the Arraigns put to them the usual question, the foreman replied:

"Guilty."

CHAPTER MLXXIV.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK MEETS WITH AN INTERRUPTION ON HIS WAY TO TYBURN.

From what has already been said, the verdict found by the jury will occasion no surprise to the reader.

Jack himself never moved a muscle when the fatal declaration was made.

Many who watched him marvelled at his coolness; but they did not think that for many hours he had exclusively occupied himself in preparing his mind for this result.

The usual question was put by the Clerk of the Arraigns as to whether the prisoner had anything to say why sentence should not be pronounced upon him in accordance with the verdict which had just been found.

Jack shook his head.

Like the rest of the proceedings on this day, the question was a form merely, for, without waiting a second after the clerk had finished speaking, the judge commenced to pass sentence.

Already he had assumed the hideous black cap which is supposed in some mysterious manner to impart additional solemnity to what is said.

The judge spoke in very low, subdued tones, yet so intense was the silence which now prevailed in the Court that there was no difficulty experienced by anyone present in hearing every syllable.

Before pronouncing the last awful words, the judge, as is customary in such cases, made some prefatory remarks, the tenor of which was the enormity of the offence of which the prisoner had been found guilty.

Then he concluded

"The sentence of this Court upon you is that you be taken hence to the prison whence you came, and from thence to the place of public execution, there to be hanged by the neck until you be dead, and may Heaven show you that mercy which the laws of this land will not permit us to display."

A kind of shudder seemed to run through the whole Court when the judge finished, as though the crowded assemblage had been possessed of but one body.

It was impossible that Jack could listen to these awful words unmoved.

Had he done so he could scarcely have been human.

He was aroused by feeling a tap upon his shoulder.

He looked round, and saw that the officers were waiting to conduct him to the cell.

He prepared to rise, but before doing so, made a sign which brought Mr. Godfrey to the front of the dock.

"You see I was right," said Jack, calmly. "Now remember to impress upon Old Matthew that it is my earnest desire that he pays strict regard to my last wishes."

Just as he spoke, Matthew himself pushed forward, and before anyone was aware of what he was about to do, he seized Jack's hand and pressed it warmly.

"Keep up your courage," he said, in a faint whisper.

"Good-bye, old friend," responded Jack, in a broken voice, and returning the friendly pressure while he spoke —"good-bye, though you ought not to have endangered yourself by thus publicly recognising me."

"Leave that to me. They can't make it a criminal act to shake hands; and as for the public-house, I have made up my mind to give that up and retire."

The officers now interposed and prevented any further conversation.

Jack was much pleased at being thus recognised, and he felt that it would enable him to pass through the ordeal which awaited him.

Upon reaching the room beneath the dock he found that Tom Davis with his wife and Ellen were among the inmates.

Fain would he have lingered and addressed to them a few last words.

But his jailers would not permit him to pause a single moment.

All he could do was to bestow upon them a brief parting glance.

The next moment the closing of the heavy door hid them from his sight.

The case against Tom Davis was the next one on the list, and accordingly they were summoned to the Court above.

Mrs. Davis was still in a condition of most deplorable weakness and exhaustion.

So faint was she, that she was allowed to seat herself upon the chair which had been so lately occupied by Sixteen-String Jack.

In accordance with the advice of Mr. Godfrey, all three of the prisoners pleaded "Not guilty."

Tom Davis was taken separately.

The charge against him was not only having been an accomplice of the band of highwaymen, but also with being an escaped convict.

In spite of an eloquent speech from Mr. Godfrey wherein he entreated the mercy of the Court, the judge sentenced him to transportation for life.

Ellen and Mrs. Davis were then separately charged with aiding and abetting felons.

The young lawyer contended that there was no direct evidence against them.

But the Court looked at the former conviction for the same offence, and sentenced them both to imprisonment with hard labour for the space of two years.

If outward appearance could be taken as any indication, then it was tolerably clear that Mrs. Davis would end her days within the walls of a prison.

The scene which followed when the moment came for the separation was heartrending.

So painful was it that we feel ourselves compelled to pass over it in silence.

All three knew that it was a lifelong separation that was to follow.

Mrs. Davis did not long survive the shock.

She died before the time came for her removal from Newgate.

As for Jack, he had resolved to try his best to meet his coming fate with fortitude.

He had played a game of which Death was the stake.

He knew that some day or other there must be an end to his career, and he was conscious that it had come at last.

There was only one point upon which he suffered anxiety.

This was the fear he had that his other comrades would make some desperate attempt to rescue him.

From the precautions that had been taken, Jack was absolutely certain that the result could be nothing but defeat—and defeat to the highwaymen meant nothing but death.

The attempt, so far from benefiting him, would only have the effect of consigning them to that fate from which he felt he could not possibly escape.

As it was, Jack felt that it would be no inconsiderable satisfaction if he could die knowing that his companions were safe.

But he feared, and with good reason, that his comrades would freely die in the attempt to save him.

He was doubtful, too, whether his urgently-made request would have any effect upon them.

Judging by himself, he knew that it would make no impression upon him were he in their place.

It may safely be said that this topic occupied his thoughts much more than any other; and in the long, dark, and silent hours of the night he would listen with feverish impatience, expecting to hear something that would give token of the approach of his comrades, and starting nervously when any faint sound floated to his ears.

There were only four days standing between the one upon which he had taken his trial and that fatal Monday upon which, for fifty-two times every year, so many trembling human beings were offered up as sacrifices to the majesty of outraged law.

Short as the time was in reality, yet it seemed very long to Jack, who had nothing to occupy him save his own sad thoughts, and nothing to break the dismal monotony of his cell.

When Sunday came, he fully expected that he would have to pass through what was to him infinitely the most painful of all—that of sitting in the chapel while the Ordinary of Newgate preached a funeral sermon.

But so great were the apprehensions felt about the safety of the prisoner that it was determined to do away with the customary ceremony.

Great, therefore, was the disappointment of those who could find no better Sabbath occupation than that of flocking to the prison chapel, in order that they might gratify their morbid curiosity for gazing upon men so soon about to die.

But with Sixteen-String Jack absent, the show was shorn of half its attractions.

As for the condemned man himself, he felt deeply grateful for his escape.

The Ordinary visited him in his cell; but Jack could not fix his attention sufficiently to understand what he said.

He was wondering all the time what his companions were about; and though he would firmly have denied that such was the case, yet in his inmost heart he experienced something akin to disappointment at having heard nothing of them.

It seemed so like deserting him; and nothing could have caused Jack half so keen a pang as the thought that he was neglected by those whom he had ever thought his best and dearest friends.

Whenever this thought occurred to him he dismissed it with angry impatience; yet, for all that, it continued to return over and over again.

Each repetition, too, seemed to be stronger and stronger, and Jack's dejection much increased.

And so passed on the time until the evening came preceding the morning which had been fixed for his execution.

And now there was deeply impressed upon Jack's mind the consciousness that his end was close at hand.

No effort of his own, no exertions of his friends, would serve to avert his doom.

The time had arrived when he was destined to take his parting look of this bright world.

Then, when the hour of midnight approached, a low and distant roar, like that arising from the sea when heard from afar off, came upon his ears.

At first he wondered what it could be that produced it.

He listened attentively for a few moments

Then he resumed his former attitude.

"I know well enough now what it is," he murmured. "It is the crowd—the gaping crowd already taking up their position in order to obtain a glimpse of the bold highwayman they have so often heard of, and to note how he looks upon his first setting out upon his journey to certain death.

"But they will be disappointed," he added, after a brief pause—"that is, if they expect to see me exhibit any great signs of emotion. I will so school myself that, no matter what feelings there may be about my heart, they shall not find expression in my countenance: no, no—that shall be a blank to them."

After the utterance of this determination, a kind of stupor seemed to creep over the highwayman's faculties.

It was not sleep, nor was it a swoon, although he was all but unconscious of everything around him.

It was rather an anomalous condition produced by want of sleep and by a terrible exhaustion.

How long he remained thus Jack had no very clear conception.

He was aroused by a touch and by the sound of voices.

Looking up, he saw himself face to face with a turnkey.

"You're a tight one, you are!" he exclaimed, with a certain kind of admiration. "Let me tell you it is very few we have to awaken at such a time as this. However, I see you mean to die game. What will you have for breakfast?"

It cost Jack a great effort to control his inclination to shudder.

"What you like," he said—"anything, so long as you leave me to myself."

A meal was brought, which constituted only the ordinary prison fare.

But Jack did not taste it.

Then came the usual visit from the officials connected with the prison.

Jack submitted to everything mechanically.

The only sign of consciousness he gave was a deep sigh of relief at the moment when his heavy irons were struck off.

He felt then as though he was almost a free man.

His jailers were on the alert, fancying perhaps the prisoner would choose the present moment for making some insane resistance.

But they were deceived.

Jack was as calm as ever.

He was then conducted to the press-yard, and upon reaching this place he inspired gratefully the fresh, cool morning air—fresh in comparison with the damp, malarious exhalations of his dungeon.

Here the hangman was in waiting, and here he was pinioned again, though in a different fashion than before.

Afterwards he was half-led, half-carried into a kind of courtyard.

This place was crowded to the utmost of its capacity by police officers.

Jack had wondered greatly how it was he had seen nothing of Skellum on this eventful morning.

The fact was that the individual just mentioned had been extremely busy in posting his men along the line of route, and taking every precaution to prevent the possibility of a rescue.

Strange rumours had been floating about the country to the effect that a desperate attack would be made while the highwayman was on his way to Tyburn, and in consequence Skellum had taken such measures as would, he felt convinced, make any such attempt futile.

Some little delay took place before all was in readiness for a start.

At length, however, Jack was lifted up into the cart and forced to take a seat upon the hideous black-and-white coffin which was destined for the reception of his body after death

[THE END OF CLAUDE DUVAL'S DEVOTED FRIENDSHIP.]

The Ordinary placed himself by his side.

The hangman mounted to a seat in front.

Under the direction of Mr. Skellum a dense body of police officers then surrounded the vehicle.

The sheriffs had by this time seated themselves comfortably in the gaudy carriage provided for their use.

Outside the large folding doors a troop of light dragoons were stationed, who for some hours past had had no small difficulty in keeping the populace at a respectful distance.

The signal for starting was given by the irascible Governor of the prison.

Scarcely had the sound died away than the folding doors were thrown open, and the first portion of the procession set itself in motion.

As it slowly defiled into the Old Bailey the assembled multitude set up loud cheers and other cries.

A fearful succession of groans proclaimed the moment when the executioner was caught sight of.

These changed again into cheers as the highwayman himself came into view.

Mr. Skellum heard the sounds with dismay.

To his ears they seemed to mean rescue.

He by no means liked the extreme resignation which Sixteen-String Jack manifested.

He inferred from it that something was going to happen.

"Keep close around him, my lads," Skellum said. "Be on the watch, and above all things don't suffer yourselves to be so much thrown off your guard as to be taken by surprise."

When the heavy vehicle passed out into the open street, Sixteen-String Jack raised his head and looked keenly around him.

But the multitude of faces which he beheld bewildered and confused him.

It was in vain for him to hope to distinguish one familiar and friendly face out of so many.

A half-repressed sigh of disappointment escaped his lips, and then he resumed his former manner.

Mr. Skellum knew not what to make of this, although he watched the condemned man's every movement, and tried his best to read his thoughts.

The troop of soldiers brought up the rear of the procession.

All carried their swords drawn, so as to have them in readiness for use at a moment's notice.

Skinner Street and Snow Hill were passed in safety—the Fleet bridge crossed and the ascent of Holborn Hill commenced.

Here it was customary to make a halt, and this would be the moment chosen most likely for an attempt at rescue.

Accordingly Mr. Skellum concentrated his forces at this point, and kept a more than ever vigilant look-out.

But the people, beyond shouting, screaming, and swaying to and fro, did not seem inclined to make any demonstration.

As soon as possible, the word was given for the journey to be recommenced.

By this time Sixteen-String Jack began to realise how unawares he had suffered hope to hold possession of a portion of his heart.

When near the gates of St. Andrew's Church, he had indeed looked wistfully and expectantly around.

At this point he made sure of seeing something that would convince him he was not neglected and forgotten by his friends.

The disappointment made itself felt most keenly.

At the same snail-like pace the procession resumed its course.

Holborn was slowly passed through from one end to the other, and the High Street of St. Giles's reached.

Here again it was customary to stop.

The landlord came out with the bowl of punch, which it was then the rule to offer to the prisoner by way of refreshment.

Jack took it as well as his pinioned arms would let him, because it afforded him a pretext for standing upon the cart.

In this position he was able to see all around him.

There were on all sides as far as his eyes could reach nothing—nothing but white faces all upturned towards him—all staring at him.

Skellum was full of excitement.

The multitude was silent—strangely and awfully silent when the vastness of it was taken into consideration and the noise which had hitherto attended it.

Jack remained thus for some moments, looking eagerly around.

Then, with a weary sigh, he returned the bowl of punch untasted, and sat down on the coffin.

This was the signal for the commencement of the former turbulence.

The silence of the people had arisen solely from the notion that Jack was about to address them, it being no unusual thing for a prisoner to make a speech when at this spot.

Now they were loud in their expressions of disappointment.

Again the procession started.

It would be hard to say, however, whether Mr. Skellum's fears were to any extent abated.

He was still a prey to great anxiety.

Jack now gave himself over to greater despondency than ever.

He felt that he was abandoned by all his friends, and the thought sent a bitter pang to his heart.

He was deserted.

And then again he would think that all that was going on around him was nothing else save some hideous dream.

In a short time he fancied he must awake to find all that which was now seemingly so real nothing but baseless unsubstantiality.

He thought, too, as he grew a little calmer, that it was most probable that all his comrades were in positions of danger scarcely inferior to his own, and such being the case, how unreasonable it was of him to look for their presence.

He resolved to think of them no longer, but to bend all his energies to the one task that lay before him—that of dying bravely.

When he again raised his eyes, he felt that present occurrences were indeed no vision, for before him he could see the dark timbers of Tyburn Tree.

It was just, however, at this moment that he became conscious that something of an unusual character was going on near him.

CHAPTER MLXXV.

TAKES A GLIMPSE AT THE FORTUNES OF CLAUDE DUVAL.

This something clearly caused a considerable amount of confusion, but what it precisely was we must go back a little way to explain.

It is with the proceedings of Claude Duval that we are now about to concern ourselves, and we revert to the moment when he broke away from the police officers at Stonehenge.

It is not for a moment to be supposed that so many fire-arms could be discharged without producing serious results.

We have seen already that Sixteen-String Jack, Dick Turpin, and Maud were more or less severely injured, and Claude Duval did not escape.

Indeed, he was wounded in no less than three places and all the hurts were serious ones.

Nevertheless, he was not incapacitated from retaining his seat in the saddle; it would indeed be a serious wound to cause him to fall, for to him riding could only be called second nature.

Away, then, he went across the broad expanse of Salisbury Plain, urging his horse by every means at his command to put forth his utmost speed.

In a moment both horse and rider seemed to be swallowed up by the intense darkness which reigned around.

Claude was in too much haste, and too much bewildered by the events which had recently occurred, to take any notice of the direction his horse was taking.

Indeed, to him just then all roads were the same.

His only object was to get out of the way of his pursuers.

The separation of the highwaymen in the manner we have previously described really was the best course they could have adopted, since the officers were much embarrassed by it.

Of course they divided all their forces so as to give chase to all the fugitives; but then they could not part themselves into various small troops without a little confusion and several moments' delay.

Claude, however, in spite of his exertions, was not able to get out of hearing of his foes.

Every now and then the wind would carry to him the dull, heavy sound produced by the concussion of many horses' hoofs upon the ground.

Whip, spur, and voice were all employed by Claude in his exertions to urge his steed forward at his utmost speed, and certainly the animal responded nobly.

It seemed an awful thing to be rushing at so tremendous a speed through the intense darkness.

He had to trust entirely to the sagacity of his horse to keep clear of any obstacle that might lay before them.

Away, away they sped in mad career, and surely at a more rapid pace than the more heavily-mounted police officers would be able to make.

But as Claude continued to call out in inspiriting tones to his steed, his voice grew weaker and weaker, until at last it became inaudible to himself.

Still he paused not, nor relaxed those efforts he was able to make.

The darkness seemed to roll around him in huge and palpable masses.

He rocked to and fro in the saddle, maintaining his balance only by a species of instinct.

His pursuers were out of hearing now, but Claude knew it not.

On the contrary, his exciting fancy made him believe that they were still hard upon his track—that the hoarse beats of their horses were thundering in his ears.

The margin of Salisbury Plain was reached, and the wooded country beyond gained.

Of this, also, was Claude ignorant.

His sole consciousness extended only to the fact that his horse was carrying him along at a furious rate, and even the sense of this grew less and less distinct every moment.

Had it been possible for any person to watch his headlong course, the utmost apprehensions would have been excited.

Every now and then it seemed as though he must inevitably be dashed to pieces.

Yet, strangely enough, he held on—held on until all became a blank.

There seemed to be a rushing sound in his ears, a mist of light before his eyes, and then all was silence and utter darkness.

Claude had swooned.

The quantity of blood he had lost was prodigious; but he did not fall from his horse until he was totally insensible.

Fortunately, just at this moment the horse was making his way across a piece of soft open ground.

On this Claude fell without injuring himself.

Falling, his feet became disentangled from the stirrups, and the horse, half maddened with terror and the manner in which he had been ridden, continued his race with undiminished speed.

He was out of sight in a moment.

Claude lay quite still—quite helpless; and had his pursuers come in that direction they would have made an easy capture.

It seemed to Claude that only a moment elapsed after his fall from his horse until he opened his eyes again.

But this was a delusion.

Contrary to his idea, many hours had passed away.

In a dreamy, semi-conscious fashion, Claude remained upon the ground, not feeling himself able to command his will sufficiently to enable him to make the slightest movement.

It was daylight.

Whether he was really aware of the circumstance is very doubtful.

At any rate, he took no notice of it.

The early morning sun had attained a considerable elevation, and his warm, rosy beams fell gratefully upon the wounded highwayman, warming his chilled limbs once more into life.

He might have remained thus for an hour, or even more, when he became conscious of something else.

This was a sound.

He listened, wondering vaguely what it was.

"It is a voice," he murmured. "Some one is singing. What a sweet and beautiful voice! Surely it must be a child's."

And then Claude relapsed into his former state—that state which was more like insensibility than life.

The voice continued singing.

It was, in truth, a sweet one.

The tones were most entrancing to the ear, and the notes were warbled forth as they might have been by some beautiful song bird.

Claude listened with intense delight.

Never before had his ears been ravished with so much melody.

As he then felt, he could have been content to remain listening for ever.

But the beautiful sounds suddenly ceased.

A shrill shriek followed, and this cry seemed to have the effect of rousing Claude partially into life.

Through his half-opened eyes he could now see the singer.

As he expected, it proved to be a young girl, who was as lovely as the sunshine of that bright morning.

The cry of alarm had been brought to her lips by coming unexpectedly upon the prostrate body of Claude Duval.

Well might her tender heart be filled with terror, for the highwayman presented a sad spectacle.

His apparel was almost everywhere soaked in blood, his hair was matted, and his face seemed to wear upon it the pallid hue of death.

The little girl carried a basket on her arm, and this, in her extreme fright, she allowed to fall to the ground.

Another moment and she would have fled precipitately from the spot, but, fortunately, just then Claude recovered the mastery of himself so as to be able to call out in a low, weak voice.

The sound reached the girl's ears and arrested her attention.

"Help!" said Claude—"help me! Don't run away! You have nothing to fear. Mercy—mercy! Help me!"

While speaking he, by a sudden effort, raised himself a little.

At first all objects spun round him so swiftly that he could distinguish nothing.

Then his vision cleared, and he perceived the little girl standing near him with her hands clasped and her eyes suffused with tears.

Traces of alarm were still distinguishable upon her countenance.

"You have no cause for fear," the highwayman continued. "If I had the will to injure anything so beautiful I have not the power. I am weak, helpless—I fear dying."

And, in fact, just at this instant such a deadly sensation of faintness came over him as justified him in thinking that his end was near.

But the young girl now showed that she was worthy of the name of heroine.

Her first fears had now quite vanished, and she came nearer in order to see whether she could not be of some assistance.

She shrunk back a little when a closer view made her more fully acquainted with Claude's terrible condition, but she overcame the weakness almost immediately.

"Shall I fetch you some water, sir?" she asked, in a gentle voice.

Claude made an affirmative sign.

He was too far gone to speak.

The girl ran to her basket, in which she seemed to have various kinds of provisions.

Her search was for a large cup, with which she ran to a spring close by and returned with a good draught of clear cold water.

Claude drank it eagerly, and the effects were almost magical.

The fever about his eyes and brain was lulled, and a fresh vigour seemed to be imparted to his limbs.

"Thanks—many thanks!" he said. "Would that I could tell you how deeply grateful I am!"

"But how came you thus?" the girl asked, in accents of great curiosity. "You are wounded, and your clothes are stained with blood."

"Yes—yes."

"How is it?"

"You shall know all in good time—I am too weak now."

"Yes—yes; how wrong and thoughtless it was of me to ask you."

"Nay—nay; it was no more than natural. May I ask you to increase still further the obligation I owe to you?"

"In what way can I aid you, sir?"

"With a little of your help," replied Claude, in a stronger voice. "I fancy I shall be able to rise to my feet."

The girl anxiously proffered the required assistance.

But Claude found the effort to rise much more severe than he had anticipated.

At last, when he was erect, the girl had to support almost all his weight, or he would have fallen back again quite helpless.

But this was produced mainly by the change of position, and the sensation quickly died away.

"Alas! sir," said the young girl, with mingled pity and distress—"alas! sir, what will you do? Where can you go in your condition?"

"Heaven help me!"

"Come, sir, be of good heart. If I might make so bold as to offer you a shelter——"

"A shelter?"

"Yes. If you will look yonder, across the moor, you will see a little thatched cottage—it is a humble place, but my home."

Claude strained his weak and weary eyes in the endeavour to make out the building of which his fair companion spoke

Dimly and imperfectly he could see something in the shape of a pretty rustic cottage.

"And you would be willing to give me shelter there?" he said, inquiringly.

"If you would accept of it."

"I shall do so, gladly."

"Then try if you can walk—do not hurry—and do not be afraid to bear upon me, for I am young and strong. We are poor—my mother and myself—and we are quite alone in the world, but still, what we can do for you shall be done willingly."

Claude was too much overcome by his feelings to utter a single word.

This young girl's behaviour touched him deeply

Oh, how glad he was to avail himself of this unexpected offer of shelter!

To his yearning spirit the little cottage seemed as the desert oasis to the parched and wearied traveller.

He made an effort to rally his remaining strength.

The task of walking was, however, almost beyond his powers, and often and often was he compelled to pause and recover himself.

But the young girl was all patience.

Instead of chiding his delay, she did her best to cheer his drooping spirits and revive his failing hopes.

"There, sir," she said at length, "your long and tiresome walk is over now. Here is our little garden-gate; and, look! there is mother in the porch, looking and wondering who it is that I have brought with me. Cheer up, sir—do cheer up! A few more steps, and then you are welcome to rest as long as you think proper."

Claude tried to murmur some words of thanks, but his voice choked him.

CHAPTER MLXXVI.

CLAUDE DUVAL IS NOT SUFFERED TO ENJOY A LONG PERIOD OF REST.

"LOOK, mother," said the young girl, as she passed through the little garden gate—"I found this poor gentleman lying dangerously hurt upon the moor, and I have offered him shelter."

"Right, Alice," Claude heard a voice say, in kindly accents.

"You need not shrink from your trouble," said Claude, faintly, "for I have the means about me to—to reward you well for what you do."

"We are Christians," was the answer, "and——"

What more was said Claude knew not.

He had been able to keep up thus far, but now his strength utterly deserted him.

A mist came before his eyes, and he was conscious of nothing further.

When he regained possession of his senses, he found himself in a small but comfortably-furnished bedchamber.

The blind had been drawn down to shut out the tooglaring rays of the sun, and over all there was such an air of calmness and peacefulness as made Claude think how enviable was the lot of those who were born to spend their lives amid such a scene.

The window was a little way open, and the hum of the busy insects without and the melody of the feathered songsters of the air reached the ears of the wounded man distinctly.

These sounds contributed much to make him inclined for rest, and insensibly his eyes closed in sleep

The slumber was long and deep, and consequently refreshing.

When Claude awoke, he felt like a new man.

Still he was in a terrible state of weakness.

He now discovered that either during his insensibility or his sleep his wounds had been skilfully bound up.

He wondered by whom, and with an inward shudder thought of the risk of detection he had run.

Indeed, he was greatly surprised that he had heard nothing of the officers, whom he fancied were close upon his track.

Apparently, however, he had eluded them.

In this way three days passed, during which the most important intelligence which reached the highwayman was that he was indebted to the good woman of the house for the care she had bestowed upon his hurts.

She explained to him that the portion of the country in which they were was so remote from other habitations that they were compelled to rely upon themselves for everything; and as she possessed a little surgical skill, she had thought it best to attend to his wounds at once, instead of waiting for assistance to arrive.

Claude thanked her earnestly, and complimented her upon the skilfulness she had displayed.

Each hour saw Claude stronger, and it was on the fourth day that for the first time he rose and dressed himself.

The woman, in the meantime, had cleaned and repaired his apparel, so that, when attired, Claude looked something like himself.

His weakness, however, was extreme, and towards evening he was compelled to throw himself at full length on the bed for rest.

Here he remained pondering deeply upon his position, and wondering what had become of his companions.

Especially was he anxious about his old comrade, Sixteen-String Jack, whom he had left in so much peril.

Now that he came to think more calmly over the matter, he regretted that he had consented to leave him in the hands of his foes without making an effort to release him.

That regret now was vain, and the consciousness of this chafed him terribly.

The longer he remained in reflection the more anxious he became, until the blood in his veins rose to feverheat.

To remain longer in the cottage he felt would be impossible.

Just then he heard a faint sound in the outer room.

He listened, and found it had been caused by the return of the young girl to whom unquestionably he owed his life, and who had been absent nearly all the day.

"Oh, mother," Claude heard her say, in cheerful tones, "you know you thought it strange that no inquiries should have been made for the poor gentleman in the next room? Well, I met with a friend of his in the town."

Claude's heart gave a great bound.

Could it be possible that his companions were at hand?

But the next words that the young girl artlessly uttered undeceived him.

"It was a man who wore a large red waistcoat—I never saw such a one before, and it made him look so strange. I heard him speaking to several others near the market-place, asking very particularly for some gentleman, who I found, from the description, must be no other than the one I found wounded on the moor."

"And did you tell the man in the red waistcoat so?"

"Yes."

Claude sprang up in bed like one suddenly galvanised.

"I quite expected to find him," the girl continued, "for he told me he should come at once. But he will be here in a moment or two at the farthest, I am sure; I will run to the door and see whether he is coming."

Here was startling intelligence indeed.

By an extraordinary accident the police had got upon his track.

He had been most innocently betrayed by the young girl.

What was to be done?

The danger was imminent indeed.

Yet how was Claude to escape it?

The mere exertion of moving about a little during the day had so much exhausted him that he was compelled to rest.

How, then, was he to hope for the power of making such efforts as would enable him to get away from his foes?

It is wonderful what a spur extreme danger is.

Claude was an exemplification of it.

Without indeed thinking for a moment of what he was about, he slipped off the bed on to the floor.

For a second he felt dizzy and sick, but the sensation speedily passed away.

It was now so dusk that he could scarcely discern the different objects the room contained, but he had often noticed that there was hanging up behind the door a cloak such as might be worn by a mounted soldier.

This Claude did not hesitate to appropriate to his own use.

At the same moment he shot the bolt softly into its socket.

This was the only fastening the door had: but slight as was its character, Claude thought that it would delay his foes at least a moment, and to him even so brief a space of time as that was of inestimable value.

Then he stepped towards the window.

So absorbed was he in what he was about that his weakness was for the time forgotten.

The room in which he had slept was level with the ground.

He looked keenly through the little panes, but in the gathering gloom he could discern no one.

No more time was to be lost.

The window was speedily opened, and Claude passed out.

"Thank Heaven," he muttered, as he stood upon the soft mould in the garden, "all is well so far! I wonder whether the officers are close at hand? If I had but my horse now I would bid them all defiance."

Crouching down so as to be sure of escaping all observation, Claude made his way to the end of the garden.

Here a low hedge barred his further progress.

At this point he stopped and looked back.

His heart beat violently.

He could command a partial view of the moor, and as he gazed in this direction he caught sight of many moving forms.

"They are here," he murmured.

Evidently the officers were making their way as quickly as possible towards the cottage, in the hope apparently of taking their intended prisoner by surprise.

Claude was compelled to remain where he was, for he feared that if he attempted to climb over the hedge he would be seen.

In less than a moment the cottage hid his foes altogether from his view.

This was all he needed.

The hedge was crossed at once, and the highwayman felt as though his escape was half accomplished.

But the officers would in a very little while find that he had taken his departure.

They would be in no sort of doubt as to the direction in which he had gone; and as they were well mounted and strong, while he was on foot and feeble, it seemed tolerably certain that they would overtake him before he had gone many yards.

Claude now found himself in a small meadow, and at the first glance he gave around him he perceived some dark object only a few yards off.

At first he could scarcely believe in the extent of his good fortune.

But a second glance seemed to show him that he had fallen into no error.

The dark object was a horse.

If he could but capture it and mount, why even then all might be well.

He approached cautiously.

But another surprise, and one of a most agreeable character, was in store for him.

The horse he saw was his own.

The trappings had not been removed, and the creature looked fresh and full of vigour.

By what mysterious means he had got there at so opportune a juncture, Claude did not pause to inquire.

He spoke, and then the intelligent animal seemed to recognise his voice.

At any rate, it permitted him to walk straight up to it and seize the bridle, which is probably what it would not have allowed a stranger to do.

Just as our friend was about to mount, he heard a great tumult in the rear.

He knew well enough what it was, without troubling to look round.

He knew, too, that it would require a concentration of all his energies to accomplish what laid before him.

To mount his new-found steed was no easy matter, and but for the fact that the police officers were so close behind him, Claude would never have succeeded.

Once astride, however, and he cared for nothing.

Without waiting to settle himself in his seat, he urged his horse forward.

He was only just in time.

The officers, furious with disappointment, were close behind him.

The foremost one discharged a pistol, and with so good an aim that the highwayman felt the bullet strike his back.

But the force of the shot was spent, and so he received no other hurt than a slight shock, which, of course, he thought not of.

Once again, then, was Claude going at headlong speed.

The officers, however, were determined to give him persistent chase.

They knew the feeble condition to which he was reduced, and felt certain that he would not be able to keep up long.

Claude himself felt very dubious as to the result.

Still his resolve was to hold on to the last.

The constantly increasing darkness was greatly in his favour.

Large clouds kept continually driving up, until the whole face of the heavens was covered up.

Then drops of rain began to fall.

At first slightly, but their force soon increased.

The cool water fell upon Claude's heated form most refreshingly.

It seemed to freshen him into new life.

He cried out in encouraging tones to his horse, and the animal bravely responded to them.

The rest it had enjoyed had made it fresh and vigorous.

No doubt it had been attracted to that meadow after Claude had fallen from the saddle, and so little frequented was this part of the country that it was no wonder it was allowed to remain for that space of time unmolested.

Away—away it flew, taking an almost direct course across the country, and utterly disregarding the various obstacles in its path.

More than one of the hedges over which it leaped were of a height and character to dismay an ordinary rider.

But the officers, having Claude's success before their eyes, essayed each dangerous leap.

Of course, riding pell-mell and in such a throng, some came to grief, but still a formidable band kept at the heels of the highwayman.

Still Claude kept on, sustained not only by the strong desire of effecting his own escape, but also by the hope that he might yet be able to be of service to his old comrade, Sixteen-String Jack.

The rain descended in torrents, and at no very distant intervals a flash of lightning would be seen, followed by a clap of thunder.

A violent storm evidently was brewing; but the conflict of elements had no terrors for the flying highwayman.

He was already drenched to the skin by the rain, and then he had the consolation of knowing that he could not by any possibility become wetter.

He listened continually—that is, as well as his rapid flight would allow—and he fancied he was fast distancing his pursuers.

This incited him to fresh efforts.

As to seeing, that was quite out of the question.

The darkness swallowed up every object at more than a few yards' distance.

But animated by the hope that success would ere long crown his efforts, Claude conquered the weakness that at times endeavoured to assert itself.

At length he came to a high-road.

He had been for a long time on the look-out for this, because he wished to change his course.

He stood for some time in doubt, however, for he knew not whether to turn to the right or left.

What he wished was to get on towards London, but as to the direction in which it lay he was unable to hazard even a guess.

"I fancy it must be to the right," he at last muttered to himself—"at any rate, I will try."

He now allowed his horse to go at a more gentle rate of speed in order that it might recover wind and strength.

The immediate fever of the pursuit was over now.

The police were, doubtless, well upon his track, and would in time come up with him if he relaxed his efforts altogether.

Claude felt terribly weak, and nothing but his stern determination enabled him to keep on.

Presently he saw before him a faint, twinkling light.

He hastened towards it.

As he had expected, this had proceeded from a road-side inn.

The sound of his horse's hoofs brought an ostler forward.

"Here you are, sir," he said, holding the stirrup for Claude Duval to dismount.

"No—no," said the highwayman, faintly, "I shall not alight. Bring me some—some brandy—a large glassful—and some oatmeal and water for my horse."

"All right, sir."

The ostler quickly returned with the articles for which he had been sent.

Claude drank nearly half a pint of neat brandy at a draught.

"My eye," the ostler ejaculated, "he's a well-seasoned vessel, and no mistake!"

The horse greedily partook of the refreshment offered it, and then Claude said:

"I am going right for London, I suppose?"

"Eh?"

"London—is this the way?"

Claude pointed in advance as he asked the question.

"Yes, that's the way," answered the ostler, scratching his head; "and a precious long way it is too."

"How far?"

"How far? Why, near enough two hundred miles. It's one hundred and ninety-nine and a half howsomever."

"So far?" said Claude, with a sigh.

"Yes. You ain't going to ride there, are you?"

"Never mind. Look here! Do you see this? It's a guinea."

"All right."

"And here's another. Now, if anybody comes and wants to know whether you have seen me, just know nothing about it; and in order that your forgetfulness may be complete, here is another."

"All right. I'll go and go to sleep, I will, and blow me if I don't think it will be a job to wake me—that I do."

He evidently comprehended.

Claude finished his brandy, and then set out upon what was to him a formidable undertaking—a ride to London; for it was here that he naturally enough expected to hear something of his comrades—at any rate, it was here where he should obtain intelligence of Sixteen-String Jack.

CHAPTER MLXXVII.

IN WHICH CLAUDE DUVAL MANIFESTS THE EXTENT OF HIS FRIENDSHIP FOR SIXTEEN-STRING JACK.

It was on that very morning when Sixteen-String Jack began his ride from Newgate to Tyburn that a horseman was urging his horse along the western high-road.

In the distance he could discern the huge mass of buildings composing London.

There was something inexpressibly anxious in his gaze.

The horseman had about him many marks which showed that he had travelled far and at a rapid speed.

His long riding-cloak was spattered with mud even up to the shoulder, while as for his steed, it would have been a most difficult matter to decide what was its natural colour.

The poor animal was fearfully jaded.

At every step its limbs trembled convulsively, showing how great was the effort required for moving even at this pace.

The traveller himself looked also ready to drop with excessive fatigue.

His face looked more like the face of a corpse than of a living being, except that now and then it twitched nervously, as from some keen mental or bodily pain.

The reader will scarcely require to be told that this worn-out and travel-stained horseman was no other than Claude Duval.

With infinite difficulty he had performed thus much of his long journey, and now that its termination lay before him he almost feared that he should be unable to reach it.

From time to time he had been compelled to pause for rest upon the road, but still the time allowed for his repose was short indeed, for the police officers still hung upon his track though unable to come up with him.

It is indeed a matter calculated to excite the greatest wonder that he should have been able to perform the journey at all.

Stimulants alone had enabled him to keep up.

The reaction would doubtless come at last, and, when it did, would be all the more terrible for having been so postponed.

But whenever Claude felt the sinking sensation coming over him he would swallow a huge draught of brandy, thus obtaining a fresh but factitious supply of strength.

Claude, however, was determined to get to London.

The idea had so fixed itself in his mind as to amount to a positive mania.

But then it is well known that it is impossible for the body to be affected without the mind becoming affected too, and certainly this must have been the case with Claude, for his ideas extended no further than simply arriving at the metropolis.

What he should do when there he would have been puzzled to tell.

What he could hope to accomplish now that he was reduced to the last stage of exhaustion was a mystery.

At the moment when his destination came in sight, some such questions as these crossed his mind, but his mental faculties were too much debilitated to allow him either to dwell upon or answer them.

He seemed impelled to go to London, but beyond that all was a blank which he vainly strove to pierce.

Another inn appeared in sight, and here he made another halt.

The landlord happened to be standing on his doorstep, and when he caught sight of the approaching traveller he could not help giving utterance to an ejaculation of amazement.

"Bless us and save us!" he cried—"what have we here?"

"Brandy!" said Claude, faintly, as without difficulty he brought his weary horse to a standstill—"Brandy!"

"Yes, sir!—hot or cold?"

"Half a pint neat, and send the ostler with something for the horse."

The landlord's amazement increased.

Nevertheless he passed indoors to execute the orders that had been given him.

His astonishment grew greater when he saw with what ease the large quantity of brandy was disposed of.

Some time had now elapsed since Claude had heard anything of his pursuers, and he might certainly have indulged himself in safety with a few hours' rest.

But his impatience now that he was so near to the end of his long journey was too great to permit this.

As soon as possible he took his departure from this inn, where the extraordinary appearance of himself and steed furnished a topic of conversation for many a day.

The stimulus of the ardent spirit now began to show itself.

His eye brightened, and much of his weakness passed away.

His horse too was perceptibly better.

The next halt was at Tyburn toll-gate.

Claude could not control the powerful impulse which prompted him to turn his eyes in the direction of the triple tree.

He started and looked again.

"Surely," he said, with a shudder, "this is Monday morning!"

He spoke as though up to that moment he had been unaware of the circumstance.

Beneath the blackened timbers of the gibbet could be seen the glittering helmets of many soldiers, while all around a remarkable concourse of people had assembled.

This was enough to make Claude aware that an execution of no ordinary character was about to take place that day.

But who was it?

Some prisoner of great importance, or the guard would not be so numerous and well armed.

Claude's heart sickened with dread.

"Now, sir," said a voice, "tuppence, please!"

The sound recalled Claude to himself.

He remembered that he was standing at the toll-gate.

Almost mechanically he plunged his hand into his pocket and dropped a piece of silver into the toll-man's hand.

"Tell me," Claude Duval asked, in a hollow voice—"who is it that is to be—be executed to-day?"

Before replying, the toll-keeper honoured him with a long stare, while he jingled the change in his hands.

"You must have come from a longish way off," he answered, at length, "not to know that."

"Who is it?" the highwayman asked again, with an impatient gesture.

"Why, Sixteen-String Jack, to be sure, that has been for so long the terror of the road. Why—but I say—hallo!"

These disjointed exclamations were caused by Claude's actions.

The shock of this intelligence was at first so great that it was with the utmost difficulty he saved himself from falling from his horse.

Every object seemed to fade away from before him.

Then with a heavy groan he recovered his senses.

He called out in a loud tone to his horse, and spurred him cruelly.

The exhausted animal made a final effort and broke into a shuffling gallop.

The highwayman's brain was now on fire, while his swelling heart seemed as though it must burst.

Jack about to be executed!

He had, then, arrived too late.

What could he do now to save him?

What course could he adopt to rescue him from his foes?

Claude thought and thought until he wrought himself into a state of positive madness.

Frenzy alone had possession of him—frenzy alone can account for what he did.

Indeed, had he been in possession of his proper senses, he would not have thought of riding into London by broad daylight without making the least attempt at concealment.

To be sure, his cloak enveloped his form, and his face was so altered by illness and fatigue as to have but little semblance to its former appearance.

Still, to ride on as he rode can only be characterised as absolute insanity.

Suddenly, as he passed round a slight bend in the high-road, he came in sight of a dense throng.

His brain reeled.

Then his eyesight grew clearer, and he was able to make out the component parts of the multitude before him.

He saw soldiers mounted and glittering with weapons and accoutrements.

He saw multitudes of police officers, nearly all on horseback, and every one armed with a drawn cutlass.

He saw in the distance the hangman's cart, the sheriffs' carriages, and, last of all, more soldiers and police officers.

And around all these, as water round an island, was a number of people greater than Claude had ever before seen.

The distance was too great for his eyes to make out who was the occupant of the fatal cart, but his heart told him.

He was inwardly conscious that it was his old and well-tried companion, Sixteen-String Jack.

At this moment Claude began to have doubts whether all that he saw was real, or whether he was the victim of some extraordinary illusion of the senses.

But this state of doubt was not permitted to continue very long.

There could be no doubt about the reality of the yells and cries that came from the throats of the assembled populace.

Then Claude asked himself what could be done?

Where now should he turn his eyes to look for help and assistance?

Tom King and Dick Turpin were he knew not where.

But for all that he could not think of permitting his old comrade to go passively to death without at least some effort, no matter how desperate, to save him.

There was no time for consideration.

The moment for action had arrived.

And now most certainly, had Claude not been more than half crazed, he would never for a single instant have contemplated making an attempt to save Jack single-handed.

But some such thoughts as these were running through Claude's mind.

He knew that popular sympathy would be on Jack's side, and he was sufficiently acquainted with the temper of crowds to be aware that this sympathy would be confined to mere cheers and cries unless some one should come forward and set them the example of action.

In that case he knew that their dislike of authority and its representatives would quickly instigate them to deeds of violence, and the liberation of the prisoner would afford them the utmost satisfaction.

Wild thoughts were these—desperate ones; but they were followed by others more wild and more desperate still.

Claude drew his cloak well around him, and pulled his hat low down over his brow.

Then he drew up to one side of the road, and awaited the coming of the procession.

It was now only a few yards off.

All eyes were at once turned towards Claude; but no one seemed to recognise him—a fact which will serve to show how much late events had altered his appearance.

"Halt!" he cried, in as loud and important a voice as his fatigue would allow. "Halt—halt, I say! Where is the sheriff?"

As might have been expected, no notice was taken of these words.

The procession continued on its way.

But as soon as Claude fairly found himself among the crowd, he cried:

"The sheriff—the sheriff! Where is the sheriff? I must see him! Where is he?"

The people, thinking probably that Claude carried a message of some importance, divided right and left, thus leaving him a clear passage, through which he could make his way as rapidly as he liked.

Claude did not fail to avail himself of this to the utmost.

There was no hesitation about him now.

He seemed to have made up his mind to a definite course of action.

And so he had.

What it was will be quickly seen.

There was no difficulty in picking out the sheriffs' carriages, for their excessive and gaudy ornamentation made them conspicuous objects.

Claude endeavoured to catch a glimpse of Jack as he sat in the cart.

But so densely was he hemmed in by mounted police officers that this was altogether impossible.

A very few minutes brought him to the door of the carriage in which the under-sheriff was riding.

His appearance attracted the attention of everyone.

But no one for a moment suspected that the haggard-looking individual was Claude Duval.

Such audacity as would be required for one with so heavy a price upon his head to mingle with a procession on its way from Newgate to Tyburn was undreamt of—incomprehensible.

The sheriff was a little red-faced man, whose eyes were almost buried in fat.

He looked as surprised as he was able when Claude placed his hand upon the sill of the coach window.

"Sir," he said, speaking in tones of deep sadness, to the effect of which the hollowness of his voice contributed not a little—"sir, I have a great—very great favour to ask of you, and in the sacred name of humanity I must ask you not to deny me."

"Eh?—what?" said the sheriff, with a puzzled air, for he was never able to grasp at the meaning of a sentence containing many words.

"I say I have a favour to entreat."

"But this isn't the time."

"Pardon me for being bold enough to differ from you; but—but—this is the time—the very moment."

"Eh? But what's it all about? What does it mean?"

"If you will allow me," said Claude, "I will explain."

"Well, well, go on—I am listening."

"It concerns the prisoner."

"The prisoner?" echoed the sheriff, with a slight change of colour.

"Yes, the condemned prisoner."

"The one in the cart?"

"Even so."

"Sixteen-String Jack?" said the sheriff, who, as Claude was silent, felt impelled to say something or other.

"Yes, so the unfortunate man has been known, but to me he is simple John Rann."

"To you—to you? How do you mean to you?"

"Why, in days long past, in the time of boyhood, he was my best and only friend."

"Your friend?" cried the sheriff, shrinking back.

"Yes; do not be alarmed. As you must be well aware, he followed evil ways. I knew what the result would be, but still he persisted in his fatal course. You understand me, sir?"

"Yes: but I don't know what it has to do with me."

"But you will see in a moment."

"Go on, then."

"I live more than two hundred miles from London, in a remote country place. By chance the intelligence that my old boyhood's friend had been captured reached me. I was ill—suffering greatly. But not long ago the parents of this misguided young man had died, and on their deathbed they had entreated me to use my best endeavours to reclaim the lost one. A dangerous illness alone prevented me."

The sheriff fidgeted about impatiently.

Claude spoke more rapidly.

"As soon as I heard what had happened, I started off. I have travelled almost incessantly ever since. I hoped to be in time to say farewell to him—I have just arrived, and find him on his way to Tyburn."

"Well, sir, and what do you want?" asked the sheriff, who never for a moment seemed to fancy that what Claude said was untrue.

Indeed, the highwayman's appearance was just calculated to corroborate what he had said.

He looked like one who had risen from a sick bed and made a long and fatiguing journey.

"Well, sir," repeated the sheriff, finding Claude did not speak, "I ask again, what do you want? What has all this to do with me?"

Claude's emotion increased.

"I want to ask you, sir, to grant me a great favour."

"And what is it?"

"That you will stay this procession for a moment, and that then you will allow me to say a few words of farewell to my old friend, and convey to him the last words of his parents. Had I arrived at Newgate in time, I know the request would not have been denied to me. It would be hard to deny me now, because I have been unable to make better speed. You will grant this favour, will you not?"

The sheriff shook his head.

"Why not?" asked Claude, with an earnestness that was real indeed. It is not much I ask."

"But—but——"

"But what?"

"We—we are apprehensive of a rescue.'

"Is it possible?"

"We have heard that some desperate attempt will be made to set the condemned man at liberty."

This intelligence caused such a revulsion of feelin on Claude's part that it was a great wonder the sheriff did not perceive his agitation.

Perhaps he did perceive it, but failed to ascribe it to its proper cause

CHAPTER MLXXVIII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK TAKES HIS LAST LOOK OF THIS WORLD.

This announcement made by the sheriff, to the effect that an attempt at rescue was apprehended, made Claude Duval doubly determined to bring the procession to a standstill.

Perhaps if he could only succeed in doing this he would be giving the opportunity for the attack to be made, for, of course, Claude jumped the conclusion that the sheriff had been correctly informed.

It is not surprising that he should do so.

Of the movements of Dick Turpin and Tom King he was quite ignorant, but considered nothing more probable than that they would endeavour to organise some plan of attack when they learned the serious position in which Sixteen-String Jack was placed.

These thoughts passed through his mind with that rapidity of which time alone is capable.

"Surely, sir," he continued, in reply to the sheriff's last remark—"surely, sir, you will not on that account refuse me this favour. Suppose for a moment you were in my place, should you not think it hard to be denied? Besides, consider what a consolation and satisfaction it would be to my unfortunate friend, not only to learn that his parents were not living, and so could not be sensible of his disgrace, but to hear the last words which those parents had said concerning him."

Claude's appeal evidently moved the sheriff.

"I will call Skellum." he said, "and hear what he says."

Who Skellum was Claude knew not, for he had never heard his name pronounced before.

Still, he drew his cloak up a little closer round his throat.

Skellum having been called, quickly made his way to the sheriff's carriage, for he expected to receive some important information.

The sheriff quickly explained to him the nature of Claude's request.

Skellum looked at the disguised highwayman keenly, but failed to recognise him.

Truth to tell, the idea that it might be one of the highwaymen of whom some of his men were in pursuit, never once crossed his mind.

"What is the answer, sir?" Claude asked, anxiously, for they were getting very near to Tyburn now.

"I leave it for Mr. Skellum to decide," said the sheriff. "To me the request seems a very reasonable one, and if Mr. Skellum has no objection, I consent."

Claude was profuse in his thanks.

Then addressing Skellum, he said:

"Do not refuse me—pray do not! What can you have to fear from one worn down to the last degree of weakness as I am? What could I do in the shape of harm, even if I had the will?"

There could only be one answer to this question.

Skellum's first suspicion that there was something dangerous in all this was allayed.

He knew not how to refuse, and so gave his consent.

But he determined to keep very close behind Claude and to observe his every movement with the keenest attention.

A feeling of unalloyed satisfaction now took possession of Claude Duval's heart.

Already in imagination he saw his old comrade a free man.

His presence by his side would be of the utmost service to those who intended to attempt a rescue.

But his breath came short and thick as he made his way through the throng under the guidance of Mr. Skellum, who made his way straight for the hangman's cart.

Claude wondered what effect his sudden appearance would have upon Sixteen-String Jack.

Would he recognise him?

Perhaps so.

This, however, was a risk which Claude was quite willing to run.

By command of Mr. Skellum the procession was brought to standstill.

It was the confusion consequent upon the execution of this order that had aroused Sixteen-String Jack to a knowledge of the fact that something of an unusual character was taking place.

The next moment he beheld Claude Duval.

He recognised his old comrade at the very first glance, but closed his eyes quickly, feeling certain that he was the victim of some inexplicable delusion.

He opened them again, only to see Claude standing still nearer, and to hear the familiar tones of his voice.

What could be the meaning of so strange a phenomenon?

Claude at liberty among so many of his foes, and, above all, with Skellum not an arm's-length from him.

[DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING MEET AGAIN AT OLD MATTHEW'S, IN DRURY LANE.]

Well indeed might Jack feel disposed to doubt the evidence of his own senses.

His heart bled when he saw to what a wreck Claude had been reduced, and fully comprehended how much he must have suffered since the time of their separation.

Claude came close to Jack's side.

"I am here either to save you or to die with you," he whispered. "Do not start—maintain your calmness at all hazards."

Claude glanced around him to ascertain whether Skellum was near, but he found that individual was no longer standing in the place where he had last left him.

Claude did not wait to ascertain his whereabouts, but resolved to avail himself to the utmost of the present opportunity.

"Be of good heart, Jack—the others have organised a rescue."

Jack's heart was so full that he could scarcely command his voice to speak.

He had just been endeavouring to reconcile himself to the unpleasant fact that he was deserted by all his friends, when lo! here was Claude actually at his side.

Hope revived in his breast, for he thought that Claude had spoken from positive knowledge, and Jack had great faith in Dick Turpin's powers.

But alas! those hopes were doomed to a most bitter disappointment.

"How came you here, Claude?" Jack asked. "It puzzles me completely."

"Hush—hush! We must reserve explanations to another time. I wonder how it is they do not commence an attack."

Claude Duval was firmly impressed with the notion that his presence near the cart would serve as a signal for the commencement of the attack.

No. 235 will be Published next Monday.

Each second he expected to hear the signal given, and then he determined to cut the cords with which Jack was bound, even if his life paid the penalty of the deed.

And now we must make the reader acquainted with something of which both Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack were unfortunately in ignorance.

The very moment that Mr. Skellum stopped near the cart he felt some one touch him gently on the coat sleeve.

Turning round, he saw that it was a police officer.

There was unbounded wonder expressed upon the man's countenance.

He made a sign for Mr. Skellum to come nearer.

That individual complied instantly, for he knew by the officer's manner that something was amiss.

This was how it was that he happened to be out of sight when Claude turned round.

"Well," said Skellum, hastily, keeping his eyes all the time fixed upon the cart—"well?"

"Mr. Skellum."

"What?"

"D—don't you know who that is?"

"Who—who?"

"That man in the cloak—there—there!"

"Well—what of him?"

"Don't you know him?

"No; how should I?"

The man looked aghast.

"How comes he here?"

"Speak, dolt; who is it?" said Skellum, impatiently.

"I can't believe my eyes," said the man; "and yet it must be. No, no,—it can't: it is too outrageous."

"Who—who?"

"Why, that man in the cloak, standing there, is—is——"

And then again he paused, as though incredulous.

"Will you speak?"

"It is Claude Duval!"

"Who?" cried Skellum, with a perfect yell—"who?"

"Claude Duval. I am certain of it. Look at him now."

"Down with him!" roared Skellum—"shoot him! Fire—fire! That is Claude Duval, and the reward is just the same for him alive or dead!"

"Discovered!" cried Claude, in a voice of inexpressible anguish. "All, then, is lost! Help—help!"

"Shoot me, Claude!" cried Sixteen-String Jack. "Do me that last service! Save me from the disgrace of the hangman's rope!—shoot me! Let that be the last, as it is the first, proof I have asked you to make of your friendship."

Claude drew his pistols, but whether he meant to comply with his comrade's demand is not clear.

The officers had at first been too paralysed with amazement to obey Skellum's command, but they stood with their pistols levelled.

"Fire!" cried Skellum again. "Ten thousand curses! Why do you not fire? Shoot him, or he will rescue the prisoner and escape."

Scarcely had the words escaped his lips than there was a sudden volley from more than a dozen pistols.

For a brief space of time a cloud of blue smoke concealed everything, and yet Skellum fancied he had seen Claude in the act of falling from his horse.

When the mimic cloud cleared away, which was in less than a moment, he found that he was right.

Claude Duval was lying helpless and motionless upon the ground—his body riddled with bullets—an ever-widening pool of blood surrounding him.

The confusion and uproar now were things of which we cannot hope to convey an idea.

"Guard your prisoner," cried Skellum, in stentorian tones—"look well to him, or he will be rescued! Stand firm!"

His orders were well responded to.

It was indeed a thousand wonders that Sixteen-String Jack had not been mortally wounded.

But the bullets whistled around him on every side and left him unhurt.

But the sudden slaughter of his old friend in cold blood almost maddened him.

He made a desperate attempt to break loose.

But he was too well bound for the attempt to succeed.

The next instant the officers were around him.

Skellum flung himself from his horse, and rushed to the spot where Claude lay.

"He is dead," he ejaculated, gazing upon him—"quite dead! How extraordinary! Who could have believed it?"

After what had occurred, Jack sat in the cart like one stunned by a heavy blow.

Life now, indeed, was bitter, and he felt that he cared not how soon he was rid of it.

Claude was dead, while he knew not what fate had befallen Dick Turpin and Tom King.

But from the fact that they had made no demonstration on his behalf he drew the worst conclusions.

The body of Claude was presently picked up, and a rude kind of bier extemporised, on which it was placed.

The order was given to convey it to Newgate, and a portion of the guard of officers and soldiers was ordered to accompany it, so as to protect it from the people.

Oh, how wistfully and earnestly Jack gazed after Claude as his remains were carried off!

When at last he could see his friend no longer, bitter tears forced themselves from his eyes and rolled down his cheeks, while heavy sobs seemed as though they would burst his chest.

As soon as ever the second procession had been started on its way to Newgate, the interrupted journey to Tyburn was resumed.

A closer watch and guard than ever was kept upon Jack.

But it was needless, for he had quite given up all thoughts of making his escape now.

After what had happened death was preferable to life.

Tyburn no longer had terrors for him.

On the contrary, he was impatient for the termination of his journey to be reached.

They had not far to go.

Tyburn Tree was not many yards distant, but their rate of progress was very, very slow, for a path had to be forced through a mass of people who already seemed packed together as closely as was possible.

Jack's head was still bent down.

He did not turn his eyes to look, but he could feel just how far distant they were from the fatal tree.

Amid frequent stoppages the journey was continued.

At last there was a final pause.

The sun was shining in mid-sky, and there fell across the cart the dark shadow of the beams of Tyburn Tree.

Jack knew where he was then.

The end of his journey was reached.

Some one touched him.

He shrank back with a shudder of loathing

It was the hangman.

The Ordinary now stood up with his open book in his hand.

For some time past he had been reading the service for the dead; but though his voice was loud and clear, Jack had been unconscious of it.

As one may say, mechanically Jack followed the Chaplain's example and stood up in the cart.

A silence that was awful from its very intensity now prevailed.

Jack gazed around him with a semi-conscious, half-stupified air.

The events that had marked the latter portion of his journey had been of so awful and so sudden a character that no one can wonder that his brain was half turned by it.

He kept continually vaguely wondering whether this could indeed be real, and this wonder was accompanied by a kind of sensation that he should presently recover his senses and find all to be an hallucination.

But, alas! for him, this species of presentiment was not destined to be realised.

All was real, and although it might be said he was not aware of it, yet he was standing on the very threshold of eternity.

The duration of his life upon this earth could easily have been counted in seconds.

Again Jack felt a touch, and it seemed to arouse him a little.

It was the hangman.

This functionary had been during the last few moments busily occupied in securing the rope to the cross-beam.

Apparently it was now adjusted to his entire satisfaction.

He had hung upon it so as to stretch it, and now nothing remained but to make a noose with it round the neck of the condemned man.

Before Jack could precisely comprehend what was going on, the rope was passed round his throat.

A choking sensation seemed now, at this last moment, to bring him back to life.

He looked around him, but the faces of the people seemed to float away, and in their place he saw, in imagination, the tragedy of Claude's death again represented.

Apparently that was his last earthly sensation.

The preparations had all been rendered complete.

The hangman and the Ordinary had quitted the cart, of which Jack was now the sole occupant.

It was, however, just as the hangman seized the bridle of the horse that some kind of disturbance seemed to be taking place on the outskirts of the crowd.

Whether Sixteen-String Jack was aware of it, or whether he derived any hope from the circumstance, who can tell?

It is perhaps scarcely necessary to remind the reader of the different manner in which executions were arranged in the times of which we write.

There was no platform then, with the falling trap that so speedily deprives the victim of his life.

The prisoner was left standing, while the cart was drawn from beneath him.

And it was thus that Sixteen-String Jack quitted this life.

Who can say what awful sensations seared his brain when he felt the only thing between him and death slipping slowly away from beneath his feet.

There seemed a kind of convulsive effort to retain a footing, and then all was over.

CHAPTER MLXXIX.

DESCRIBES WHAT BEFEL TOM KING AFTER HIS FLIGHT FROM STONEHENGE.

We refrain from entering into any further details of the sickening scene.

We will only mention that the condemned man—to employ the phrase made use of at the time—"died hard."

And no wonder that there should be a desperate struggle between life and death when the victim was slowly choked—strangled by the weight of his own body.

But in a few moments the bold, daring highwayman, who had for so long a period set the whole machinery of the law at defiance, breathed his last.

Nothing remained of him save a senseless mass of inert clay that slightly swung to and fro, and half turned round in a hideous fashion as it was swayed by the light morning breeze.

No sooner, however, was it known that life was extinct than the intense silence of the assembled crowd changed to a tremendous uproar.

Some said that a well-organised attempt to rescue the prisoner had been made, and the chief cause of its failure was that the attempt had been made too late.

There were others, though, who said that this was a mere idle rumour.

At any rate, the scene of fearful riot which now ensued was a disgrace to a nation setting up any claim to civilisation.

Savages could have behaved no worse.

And this lasted for an hour—the time prescribed for elapsion before the hanged man was cut down.

A great part of the crowd no doubt dispersed before this, but the bulk remained.

After the ceremony they had by degrees separated.

The body was roughly placed in the rudely-made coffin provided for its reception, and, still guarded by soldiers, made its way back to Newgate.

Here the two highwaymen who had been so long united during life were again placed side by side in death.

The fatality was a strange one.

It was about this period that the custom of interring executed prisoners within the walls of the prison was commenced.

Previously they were either handed over to the doctors for dissection, or else suspended in irons upon a gibbet in proximity to the scene of crime.

But Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack were to be buried in the prison.

A larger grave than ordinary was dug, and in this the two coffins were placed, so that the two friends were still side by side.

The earth was shovelled in, and the sole funeral service was comprised in the remarks made by the turnkeys as they as hurriedly as possible got through their disagreeable task.

That the intelligence of the extraordinary manner in which the famous highwayman Claude Duval had met with his death should fly like lightning over the whole city is no matter for surprise.

But the effects of this news upon those particularly interested in the highwayman's welfare we must defer to another occasion.

So much is waiting for relation in order that the narrative may be brought down to one point, that we must defer for the present a description of the startling events which followed fast upon the interment of the two highwaymen.

We go back several days—in fact, to the morning which succeeded the night when the highwaymen were attacked at Stonehenge.

It was only just getting light, and objects for the most part were buried in a dense white vapour.

As this by degrees rolled away, the different features of the landscape came into view.

One of the most prominent was a precipitous cliff, which served for a wall to prevent the encroachment of the ever-surging sea.

The landward side of this cliff was rugged and steep, and in most places overgrown with tangled vegetation.

The spot was excessively lonely and drear, and looked so, especially when shrouded by the white vapour we have mentioned.

No traces of even the occasional presence of human beings on that dreary spot could be discerned, and the silence was only broken by the unending roar of the breaking waves on the beach below.

All at once, the desolation of the place was strangely broken in upon.

An eye fixed upon a certain portion of the cliff side would have beheld a singular phenomenon.

What seemed to be nothing else than a portion of the solid rock slowly rose up, disclosing a dark oblong opening in the ground.

Immediately afterwards, a dusky form appeared at the aperture.

"I told you so, captain," said a gruff voice. "Morning has fairly come at last, and devil a sign is there to be seer of the old Ferret or his waggon either."

"Are you sure?"

"Come and look for yourself, captain."

Another dusky form now appeared at the mysterious opening.

"What a fog!" said the new-comer. 'If the Ferret would come even now I would risk it; anything would be better than keeping the cargo here."

"Oh, it's safe enough, captain—take my word for that no one will find this place out."

"No matter, the goods ought to be inland by this time."

"Hush!" said the first speaker. "I heard something then."

"What was it like?"

"A horse."

"Then perhaps it is the Ferret after all. Curse him for being so long, say I! What the devil can have detained him?"

Both listened.

"It's not the Ferret, captain."

"If it is, he is without a waggon."

"No—no, he would not ride like that. Why, a man must be mad to gallop a horse at such a rate!"

The rapid beats of a horse's hoofs could now be heard, and, from the rapidity with which these succeeded one another, it was evident that the animal was making no ordinary speed.

The two dark forms at the opening in the ground stood with eyes fixed wide open by curiosity.

"I should think it is some horse broke loose," said the captain, at length. "No one would be mad enough to ride towards the precipice at such a rate as that."

"We shall see in a moment," returned the other. "Curse the fog, how thick it is!"

"Yes—yes, there it comes—a horse with something on its back; but not a man, surely!"

The utmost excitement now prevailed.

Through the dense mist could be seen the figure of a horse, which seemed to be enveloped in a cloud of half-transparent vapour.

Upon the animal's back was a something, but what could not be distinctly seen.

It did not look like a man, for it was something that appeared to be crouching close to the saddle, and partly hanging down on one side.

But two causes combined to dispel the mystery.

The mist was fast rising, and the horse was galloping towards the opening in the ground with scarcely, if at all, diminished speed.

"It's a man," said the captain, at length—"yes, it's a man; and either dead or badly wounded."

There could no longer be a doubt about the correctness of this conjecture.

But, stranger still, the horse, finding himself near the aperture, stopped suddenly—so suddenly that its rider, unable any longer to keep the saddle, fell heavily to the ground.

Ejaculations of astonishment burst from the lips of the captain and his subordinate upon viewing this occurrence.

"Who can it be?" gasped the former.

"The horse has been here before," was the reply. "He knows the place well enough, that is evident, or why should he stop?"

"Let us see who it is," was the captain's next remark. "Curse it! if they are here many moments it will be quite light, and then there will be no knowing who may see us."

"The place may be discovered."

"We must prevent that, at all hazards. Ah!" said the captain, bending down over the blood-stained and apparently lifeless form, "I know him. It's all right. Call some of the Sea-gulls to carry him inside, and lead the horse in as well."

"Who is it, captain?" asked the other, who had just whistled shrilly.

"Why, one of those chaps that rendered us such good service the other night."

"What, the one we have provided the Sea-gull for?"

"Yes."

At this moment the aperture was thronged with men, all clad in a species of naval costume.

The captain of the band of smugglers—for he indeed it was—had not been mistaken.

It was Tom King who had been brought thus to the secret entrance of the cave.

The reader will easily be able to account for his presence in this place.

After speaking to Claude Duval in the manner we have related at the close of a preceding chapter, he had started off at full speed.

But Tom King was badly hurt—

So badly that his last words were almost inaudible.

But, nevertheless, although all objects seemed whirling around him, he retained his place in the saddle.

He was, however, quite beyond the power of making any effort to urge his horse forward.

The animal went entirely at the rate which pleased him.

By an accident, this chanced to be extremely rapid.

The horse had been wounded by one of the pistol shots—just sufficient to madden the creature by the irritation it occasioned.

Under this incitement, as though urged by the spur, the poor animal flew across Salisbury Plain with a speed which equally defies description or conception.

We can only characterise it as furious to a degree.

An ordinary rider would have been appalled at finding himself upon the back of such an infuriated animal; but Tom King thought nothing of it.

His life depended upon his getting away quickly, and he would have preferred a thousand times to meet with his death by some unforeseen accident than fall into the hands of his foes for a moment.

Tom reasonably enough dreaded capture, for he was fully convinced after what had happened he would never be allowed the ghost of a chance of making his escape.

Still, as he was able to exercise so little control over his steed, there seemed every probability that his capture would ere long take place.

The animal's terror would most likely abate before long, and then, being left to himself, his rate of speed would be decreased.

Of this danger it cannot be said that Tom King was precisely conscious.

He knew he was flying from his foes, but of the direction in which he was going at so frightful a pace he had no idea.

But truly to him, under these circumstances, all ways were alike so that his foes were in his rear.

But the animal showed no signs of flagging—to have beheld it one would have thought it must be under the continual influence of whip and spur, and that they were both plied with the utmost vigour.

As we have seen, however, the horse, in spite of its terror, was not altogether blind to instinct.

The reader will remember that its last journey was from the smugglers' cave to the ruins at Stonehenge.

In the former place it had remained for some considerable time, and all the while it had been well treated, so there is nothing wonderful in the circumstance that it should make its way back to its old quarters by the nearest and most direct route.

How opportune was the moment of its arrival there is known.

Consciousness had left Tom for some time, and he only owed his seat in the saddle to the vigour with which he had grasped the pommel of the saddle.

He had seized it with the convulsive grasp of a dying man, and so, half lying on the horse's back and half lying on one side in the most perilous position imaginable, he had reached his destination.

The sudden jerk, however, dismounted him, and bereft him of what little consciousness he might have retained up to this moment.

At a word from the captain, several of the men came forward, and, raising Tom in their arms, carried him into the cavern.

The horse was now quiet and subdued enough, and permitted himself to be led in unresistingly.

"Down with the trap!" cried the captain, in a rapid voice. "Look! I can see horsemen yonder! Quick—quick, or we shall be discovered!"

There was a sudden rushing noise, and the huge trap-door resumed its former position.

"That's well," was the captain's ejaculation; and then, having issued a few commands respecting Tom King, he mounted to another place where, through a kind of loophole, he could obtain a partial view of the scene without.

Of course the approach of these horsemen filled him with some little anxiety, and he wished to keep a close watch upon all their actions.

The reader will not require to be told that these horsemen were Tom's pursuers.

They were only able to get thus far so soon by treating their horses cruelly and by obtaining relays.

On they came, and by their manner they evidently expected each moment to catch sight of the fugitive.

By this time very little of the mist remained.

The sun had risen, and his beams illuminated the scene for miles round.

The officers looked keenly about them.

But, in spite of their efforts, they failed to catch a glimpse of the object of their anxious pursuit.

But they came on towards the cliff as though aware that the fugitive had taken this direction.

The captain began to grow anxious.

He was apprehensive that there might be on the ground some marks by which the officers could follow in the right track.

it so, the secret of the cave would undoubtedly have been discovered; and the captain was more than usually anxious in consequence of the quantity of goods now stowed away in it.

But his apprehensions subsided.

The police officers rode by, making their way apparently to the top of the cliff.

No doubt they thought that from this point they should be able to command an extensive view.

More easy in his mind now, the captain quitted his post, and made his way to that portion of the cavern to which he had directed the wounded highwayman to be taken.

He found Tom quite insensible, and bending over him was a woman who possessed no ordinary skill in surgery, especially in the matter of shot-wounds or sword-cuts.

From the nature of the smugglers' occupation, her skill was very often called into requisition.

"Well, Meg," asked the captain, "what do you think?"

"Bad—very bad."

"But you will bring him round?"

"I will try."

"Take my advice, and try your best, for, unless I am now more mistaken than I have ever been in the whole course of my life before, this is a man who will reward you in no ordinary fashion for restoring him to life."

"It will take a long time," muttered the old woman, "no matter how he may be favoured."

To this remark the captain did not think fit to make any reply, but walked away with the air of one by no means easy in his mind.

For a long time the old woman tried in vain to restore Tom to his senses; and when she did succeed it was but for a moment, for the highwayman immediately closed his eyes and sank off into a profound slumber.

But this augured well, and in the meantime she took the opportunity of attending to his hurts.

They were indeed of a frightful character, and any one of them would have sufficed to create grave doubts about the ultimate recovery of the patient.

Fortunate—thrice fortunate was Tom in having thus fell into such good hands.

Had his wounds been left for any longer time unattended to, his death must have been the result.

Now, however, thanks to the sagacity of his horse, he was in what might be termed a place of perfect safety, for there was no fear that the smugglers would betray him; and as for the officers discovering the entrance to the cave, that was scarcely likely.

CHAPTER MLXXX.

IN WHICH TOM KING SETS OUT ON HIS EXPEDITION IN SEARCH OF HIS MISSING COMRADES.

A VIOLENT fever seized upon Tom King, attended by delirium.

The smugglers in the cave listened in wonder to his wild ravings, from which, however, they obtained a clue to his identity.

Days elapsed before the wounded man obtained the least inkling of his condition or of his whereabouts.

But when he opened his eyes and languidly looked about him he was aware that the objects he beheld were familiar ones.

Where it was he had seen them, or how he came now to be surrounded by them, were questions which, in his present state, he was powerless to solve.

But from the moment when he thus, for the first time, regained possession of his mental faculties, he grew steadily better.

Never had old Meg obtained a greater victory, for so desperate had been the highwayman's condition that half the doctors in London would have given him up as a hopeless case.

With many a bitter pang, however, did the remembrance of past events return clearly, though slowly, to him.

His last remembrance was riding at a headlong pace through the darkness.

How he had come to be an inmate of the smugglers' cave he knew not.

He was chafing from the ignorance he was in upon this point, when the captain, who had heard he was better, came to the side of the rude bed.

Tom questioned him anxiously, and then he learned all those particulars with which the reader has already been made acquainted.

From this knowledge the wounded highwayman derived but little consolation or satisfaction.

Fain would he at that moment have set off in quest of his lost comrades, but he found himself unable to raise his head six inches from the bed.

"Rest and be quiet," said the captain. "It is the only chance you have; and the calmer you keep yourself the sooner you will recover and be enabled to take your departure."

Tom knew this well enough without being told.

The difficulty was, under such circumstances as those in which he was placed, to put such counsel into action.

Although, mentally, he was greatly agitated, yet he contrived to keep himself tolerably calm.

More weary time passed.

How long Tom knew not, for in that dark place, where there was nothing to distinguish day from night, it was no easy matter to keep count.

Still he was encouraged by the knowledge that he was steadily continuing to gain strength.

Finally a time arrived when he felt it would no longer be possible to remain in inaction.

He was able to move about the cavern, and as soon as this was the case it became impossible for him to remain any longer in confinement.

Fortunately he had about him such an amount as satisfied the smuggler captain, who said, with great impressiveness:

"Tom King, you and your companions can, with the utmost safety, trust yourselves in my hands. No earthly consideration shall induce me to betray you."

"You shall be well rewarded for your fidelity," answered Tom.

"That I know well; and now will you consent to take a little advice from me?"

"Assuredly."

"Well, then, as soon as you can meet with your companions send them here—one at a time, if you like: you see the retreat is a perfectly safe one."

"True."

"Then as soon as you are all assembled and in readiness to start, I will have a craft at hand that shall waft you over to the coast of France in less than twelve hours."

Tom warmly expressed his thanks, and declared that he should not fail to put such a good piece of advice into execution.

At any other time he would have had much more to say upon the subject, but now he was too anxious to rejoin his companions to be able to think of aught else.

He was pleased to find that his horse was in the best condition, for during his illness it had been well attended to.

The animal seemed capable of making a very long journey indeed.

Plenty of ammunition was placed at Tom's disposal, so that he may be said to have been as well equipped for his expedition as could be desired.

Before leaving, however, a scout was sent out to ascertain whether the coast was clear, and on his return with the intelligence that there was not a soul in sight, the huge trap-door was raised by means of the machinery attached, and Tom issued forth.

He mounted without delay, and rode off, while the trap-door was immediately closed, lest its whereabouts should become known to some prying eye.

The night was dark but fine—just such a one as would be chosen for an excursion on the high-road: but on the present occasion Tom had other thoughts.

He had been for so long an inmate of the cavern that he felt the cool night wind acutely.

He shivered, for it seemed to cut through his very bones.

Every now and then he would be reminded most unpleasantly that he was in a state of very great weakness, and but little fitted for the task he had undertaken.

But his strong determination enabled him to master his weakness in a very great degree.

Ere he had gone far, however, he began to ask himself a question which he ought to have taken into consideration earlier.

This was, where should he be likely to meet with his comrades?

When they separated there was no time to arrange a meeting-place, and so there was nothing but uncertainty before him.

Strive as he would, he could not make up his mind as to which would be the point they would most likely fix upon to repair to

At last, as one may say almost in sheer desperation, he resolved to turn his horse's head in the direction of Stonehenge.

It was there he had seen them last, and perhaps on arrival there something would arise to put him on the right track.

This was a frail hope indeed, still it was his only one, and so he clung to it as people do cling to a thing when they know it is their last and only resource.

The distance to Stonehenge was considerable, yet such was the excellent condition of his steed that the journey was performed in comparatively speaking a short space of time.

On reaching Stonehenge Tom found the place silent and deserted, and showing no signs of the conflict which had taken place there such a short time ago.

To Tom it appeared particularly short, owing to the length of time he had passed while in a state of complete unconsciousness.

Vainly, however, did he search around for some trace of his absent friends.

He even had the temerity to raise his voice and call aloud upon them by name, but the only reply he received was the mocking echo of his own voice.

Tom's heart was heavily oppressed.

He was weighed down by a presentiment that something terrible to all of them was about to happen.

The mysterious gloom which enwrapped the Druids' Stones was well calculated to inspire melancholy reflections.

Suddenly, however, the silence was broken in upon by a sound that struck a chill to Tom's heart.

It was a mocking laugh.

"Ha, ha!" said some one.

Tom raised himself and looked around, while his hand instinctively sought for his weapons.

"Ha, ha!"

Nothing could be more horribly discordant and unmirthful than this laugh.

Tom felt that it was in derision of himself and his efforts.

"Ha, ha!"

The unnatural sound seemed to come from different quarters of the ruins.

Tom shuddered, for, in spite of himself, superstitious fancies began to crowd about his heart.

He was just then in the state of mind for an occurrence of this description to make a deep impression upon him.

"Who and what is it?" he cried, though it cost him a great effort to raise his voice. "Who and what is it, I say?"

No answer was returned.

Tom waited, but the silence seemed to grow more and more profound.

"I will trouble myself no further with this," he said, half aloud and half to himself. "I am weak and fanciful, and this desolate spot affects me. It may have been my fancy only. I will go—I will go."

He urged his horse forward a few paces and then stopped.

"In what direction shall I go?" he asked himself, with a heavy sigh. "Alas! I know not, but feel as though I stood on the brink of an ocean of misfortune. Let me try to think again. London—yes, Jack was taken to London: that is, if he did not escape by the way. He has gone to London. I promised to rescue him. The others have doubtless gone thither—I will go there too, and will do my best to help him. Yes—yes, I ought to have thought of it before. London—London."

"Ha, ha!"

Again that derisive, mysterious laugh.

He had uttered the last word a little louder than the rest, and the laugh seemed to mock at his intention.

"This is unbearable!" he exclaimed. "It is no freak of fancy! Dastardly coward! Whoever you may be, come forth and face me—I fear you not!"

Again silence.

This was most provoking.

Tom was tempted to stay and endeavour to unravel the mystery; but upon a second thought he remembered how precious was every moment of time, and that in justice to his comrades he ought to allow no delay.

"Some other time," he muttered—"some other time—not now. London—London—I must go to London."

"Stay!" said a voice, so abruptly and so close at hand, that Tom started, while his horse swerved violently.

Tom glanced around, but in the dark shadow cast by the Druids' Stones he could distinguish nothing.

But there was something definite about the command, and Tom almost mechanically obeyed it, while he waited impatiently to hear something more.

But again vexatious silence followed.

"Why should I stay?" the highwayman asked, angrily.

"You ride to your death!" said the same voice.

But this time the speaker seemed behind him.

Tom instantly wheeled round.

But, as before, he could see nothing.

"I ride to London," he said, at length.

"You ride to your death!" repeated the voice, but in such wild, screaming tones, that it was impossible to say whence the sound proceeded.

"I will hear no more!" Tom cried. "It is doubtless some person playing a game at the expense of my credulity and superstition. But if ever I discover them, woe be to them!"

Tom at once set forward with the settled determination of riding out of the ruins as quickly as he could.

But the hideous voice pursued him with yells and screams, and occasional outbursts of unnatural laughter.

"You ride to your death!"

The shrieking tones rang in Tom's ears as he urged his steed towards London.

Cold drops of sweat stood upon his brow.

Had this adventure left him unmoved, Tom would indeed have been something more than mortal.

Strive as he would, he could not bring himself to believe that all this proceeded from a trick—though he would fain have persuaded himself so.

It seemed as though he had been warned that if he rode to London he should ride to his death.

But even had he been sure that the warning was a real one, it would not have induced him to abandon his companions to their fate.

"It may be to my death," he said, with another weary sigh, which seemed to be wrung from him more by excessive bodily exhaustion than aught else—"it may be to my death; but, for all that, I shall ride to London; and as for the incomprehensible event which has just occurred, I will banish it from my mind, as it deserves to be."

It is easy enough to make resolves of this kind, but very difficult indeed to carry them out.

Tom found this to be the case, for as he urged his horse at a hard gallop in the direction of the metropolis, he fancied in every hoofbeat that he could hear the echo of that horrible voice.

The wind whistled it in his ears—

The rustling of the tree-tops resembled it.

It could not be banished.

But still Tom kept bravely to his course.

He wanted to make the most of the hours that remained between then and daybreak.

He had only his own senses to guide him on his course, but, like the manners of old, he glanced up at the shining stars in the sky, and shaped his course accordingly.

Thus he continued until the morning sun was some distance above the horizon.

The part of the country he was in proved so very lonely and unfrequented, that he resolved to push on, though his original intention had been to travel only during the night time.

It was somewhere towards ten o'clock when he caught sight of the first habitation he had seen for a long, long time.

Fancying it might be an inn, he slightly changed his course, and turned his weary horse's head towards it.

His conjecture proved correct.

The place had a silent, sequestered air, as though it was only rarely that travellers paused before the door.

No one was in sight, and Tom was about to call aloud for the ostler, when his attention was attracted to a bill that was pasted on a pump that stood at one end of the long horse trough.

Prompted by curiosity, and perhaps also by a conviction that the bill in some way concerned himself, he drew nearer.

The first glance was enough to satisfy him that he was not deceived.

He did not stop to read it.

He was satisfied when he saw that it offered a large reward to anyone who would capture Dick Turpin.

Clearly, then, this little public-house was no resting-place for Tom.

While a description of himself was pasted upon so conspicuous a situation he could scarcely hope to remain unrecognised.

Accordingly, upon the very instant that he made this discovery the highwayman set spurs to his tired horse, and continued on his way just as the landlord and ostler made their appearance.

They called aloud for Tom to stop, but, of course, he disregarded their cries entirely.

"Very likely I shall find this to be the case at every inn upon the road," he murmured, "and, for fear that it should be so, will not attempt to stop at any of them. What I require I must obtain elsewhere."

This was no pleasant prospect for Tom, who thought, and not without reason, that he might travel a long time without meeting with a habitation of any kind.

But fortune seemed inclined to favour him, for, before noon, he observed a farm-house pleasantly situated upon a hillside, and only a little way out of the course he intended to take.

Here he repaired, and the inmates of the place, who were easy-natured, good-tempered people, treated him most hospitably.

It was certain that they had not the remotest idea of his identity, though one would have thought there was much in the appearance of the highwayman to excite suspicion.

Despite his terrible fatigue, Tom stayed here only till nightfall.

His anxiety to learn something of his friends made rest almost an impossibility.

His horse, however, was all the better for this brief halt; and having liberally rewarded the people at the farm, Tom King continued on his way.

"London," he murmured to himself—"when shall I be there? Late—too late, I fear! Riding to my death! Am I doing so? Bah! I will think of it no more."

To follow the highwayman's course more minutely than we have already done would only be tedious.

It was not as though his journey was likely to be marked by any incidents of a deeply-interesting or very extraordinary description.

His main care was to keep out of sight of his fellowmen as much as possible, and arrive at his destination in the least possible space of time and by the most unfrequented route he could discover.

The reader, then, will not be surprised to learn that, without the occurrence of anything of a sufficiently startling description to merit record, he reached London.

By a strange fatality, however, the time of his arrival was something less than twelve hours after Claude Duval's.

As Tom King rode at a round pace along the broad high-road little did he think by what a short time Claude had preceded him; and still further from his thoughts was the supposition that at that very moment, when he was looking forward hopefully to a reunion, two of his old comrades were lying interred beneath the flagstones in one of the passages of Newgate.

A terrible blow awaited him—one that would be all the more terrible on account of its entire unexpectedness.

Unlike Claude, in the morning, Tom King had arranged in his own mind a clear and definite course of action.

He had no need to pause for deliberation.

His intention was to make his way as secretly as he could to Old Matthew's, in Drury Lane.

There was much danger to be encountered, doubtless, in the attempt, but he felt that if anywhere, the White Horse was the place where some intelligence of his friends could be obtained.

Taking every precaution, then, to avoid recognition, he rode through the gate at Tyburn.

A glare of light attracted his attention to a spot lying on his left hand.

It was where the hideous gallows stood, near which, for some cause or other, a hugh fire was burning.

Dusky figures moved about, exciting the highwayman's curiosity very strongly, but he could not spare the time just then to ascertain the meaning of what he saw.

He fancied that an execution was about to take place on the morrow—not that there had been one early that morning.

London now was only a very short distance in advance.

An hour at most, he hoped, would see him on Old Matthew's threshold.

Turning at once into the dark and narrow streets, he made his way, in a devious direction, to the spot he so much wished to reach.

Contrary to his expectation, but little notice was bestowed upon him, and from this he derived the hope that he should be able to gain the White Horse undetected.

There was a reason, however, for Tom's remaining thus unmolested.

The officers were all busy congratulating themselves upon the success they had already achieved, and were planning fresh designs to be put into immediate execution.

Thus it happened that the highwayman succeeded in reaching Old Matthew's in perfect safety

Tom shrunk a little from entering, however, for the house seemed unusually full of company.

CHAPTER MLXXXI.

BRINGS DICK TURPIN ONCE AGAIN BEFORE THE READER.

TERRIBLE indeed was the shock to Dick Turpin when, on recovering from his illness, he discovered that what had haunted him, and seemed like a terrible dream, was a hideous reality.

Such grief as preyed upon Turpin's heart cannot be expressed by words—only those who have suffered a similar bereavement can form a due conception of it.

Maud was dead!

It seemed, then, as though the only tie that bound the bold highwayman to earth was rudely severed, and for ever.

Buried, too—laid beneath the earth by strangers' hands, and, above all things, him absent from the ceremony.

That, indeed, was an additional pang of extreme intensity.

It would not be too much to say that this circumstance redoubled Dick's grief, were it not for the impossibility of such a thing.

During the state of utter prostration which followed his recovery from the violent fever into which he had been thrown, he occupied himself in minutely questioning the good woman of the house.

From her lips he learned the whole of the particulars connected with poor Maud's decease and burial.

Then, when strength returned to the highwayman's exhausted frame, the first use he made of it was to creep towards the little graveyard.

The distance was trifling, but almost too great for Dick in his present state.

He accomplished it; and when he entered the silent little enclosure he needed no one to point out the grave.

Interments in this retired hamlet were comparatively rare events.

There was but one grave that was not furnished either with a rude cross or headstone, or else was covered with beautiful flowers.

That one grave looked conspicuous enough among those around it, for the dark colour of the recently-dug earth formed a great contrast to the bright green flower-spangled turf that met the eye on every side.

With a terrible groan—such a sound as one would imagine a human being would give vent to at the moment when a heart is broke with grief—Dick Turpin threw himself at full length upon the grave.

Tears, hot and scalding, streamed from his eyes—sobs that shook his whole frame seemed to burst from his throat rather than be uttered.

There was no human being near to look upon his great affliction, and Dick gave way to it without restraint.

Bitterly—most bitterly did he reproach himself for having been the means of bringing down upon one so good and gentle such an untimely, undeserved fate.

But for the fatal chance that had brought them together, how happy and how stainless might have been her lot!

Vain indeed were these regrets, and it was the knowledge that they were so which made his reproaches all the more poignant.

Oh, how he wished that he had never lived to be made acquainted with so much misery!

How he wished that he was lying calmly and peacefully at her side!

From this moment forth he felt life would have no charms for him.

The bold, light-hearted terror of the road was in existence no longer—Turpin's life would never be again what it had been.

He felt that he should court death rather than shun it, and that he should rejoice when a bullet laid him low.

More than once, in his distracting anguish, he was about to lay violent hands upon his own life.

It was only a sense of duty—a knowledge that he had something to perform—that enabled him to restrain himself.

He thought of his companions—those who looked up to and trusted him as leader.

He was certain that they never stood more in need of his services than they did now.

At length Dick rose from the grave; and if anyone had observed his face at the moment when he entered the little churchyard and had seen it now, the difference would indeed have apeared striking.

His features were now composed.

To all outward appearances he was calm; but he looked like one who had decided upon the performance of some great and necessary duty.

Determination—invincible determination showed out in every lineament.

His step was slow as he made his way back to the little cottage, but he fancied it was somewhat firmer than when he set out.

Suddenly, however, as he walked on his way, a bright flush of colour came into his cheeks—a light sparkle in his eyes.

All at once his gaze had fallen upon his gallant mare, Black Bess.

Some idea of his grief may be formed when it is known that up to this moment he had been so absorbed that the very existence of his faithful steed had been forgotten.

As he gazed upon her noble form his heart smote him, for no one knew better than himself how much he owed to her.

Black Bess, as usual, had recognised her master.

With a low neigh, expressive of the utmost gratification and delight, she bounded towards him and rubbed her head against his breast, as was her wont.

Tears stood in the highwayman's eyes.

"Poor Bess," he murmured, though his emotion almost choked him—"poor Bess! I ought to think myself fortunate in having you left me. God knows, when you are gone, I shall be a wretched and forlorn outcast indeed!"

The prospect seemed too terrible for contemplation, and holding down his head, he caressed the noble creature's neck.

But the joy which Black Bess exhibited upon then finding her master after so long a separation jarred most unpleasantly upon Dick's spirits.

He could not bear to see it, and so continued his way to the cottage.

He had some trouble to prevent her from entering after him.

The next day saw the highwayman once more calm, settled, and determined.

He was leaving the cottage with the intention of again visiting Maud's last resting-place, and wondering how he should proceed to render assistance to his comrades, when he caught sight of a form that seemed familiar to him.

It was that of a man.

Evidently he recognised Dick, for he waved his hand and walked rapidly up from the beach.

Turpin, however, could not remember where he had seen the man before.

"Beg pardon, sir," said the new-comer, touching his hat in nautical fashion, "I hope I do not intrude upon you, but I thought—that is, I fancied that you might want my boat again, and if you do, there it is high and dry on the beach."

Dick now remembered the man perfectly.

It was the fisherman who had done such good service by bringing Maud and himself over from England in his bark.

There was a certain air of embarrassment about the fisherman, a kind of expectation of something, the cause of which Dick did not for a moment comprehend.

But his memory was beginning to come back to him and to serve him more faithfully.

"I have not yet fulfilled my promise about the reward," said Dick, in reply; "but fear not that I shall fail to do so."

"Oh, sir, that's all right enough; I would not have mentioned such a thing for the world. I was very sorry to hear of your loss," he added, with a tear in his eye, "because I can understand it."

"Is not your wife better?"

"No better, sir, I am afraid, and yet I can't say that she is worse."

"Let us hope for the best."

The man shook his head.

"At any rate," continued Dick, "you shall have the means of providing her with every luxury; and if delicacies will save her life, be under no apprehension about it."

"I hope it may be so, but yet I can't help thinking that you rate my service too high."

"That would be impossible. But never mind that now. Your presence here just at this particular moment is most opportune, and you will be able greatly to increase the obligation I am under to you."

"Indeed, sir!"

"Yes, I desire instant passage back to England—that is," he added, in a broken voice, "in the course of an hour or two."

The prospect of leaving Maud affected him terribly.

"I shall be ready, sir," answered the fisherman. "I will go and trim my boat at once. The tide will serve in about a couple of hours, and we ought not to lose the advantage of it."

"No, no, certainly not. I will take care to be quite ready by then. On my arrival I will place the reward in your hands."

The fisherman expressed his thanks as well as he was able, then turned away.

Dick Turpin, with slow and melancholy footsteps, took his way for the last time to the little graveyard, beneath the turf of which reposed all that was dear to him in this life.

Seating himself upon the little mound of earth which marked Maud's grave, he buried his face in his hands and gave himself up to thought.

Who shall attempt to describe the nature of his reflections on this occasion?

We shrink from the task.

The solemn sound caused by the church clock striking the hour roused him once more to the concerns of this life.

When he lifted his head his face was very pale, and his eyes deep sunk and lustreless.

Ineffably sad and yearning was the glance which Dick gave to the grave; then, as though he could not trust himself to remain a moment longer, he turned away.

Near the little picturesque gate, however, he was obliged to pause.

He looked around him carefully and slowly, as though desirous of impressing every one of its details upon his mind.

There seemed to be an inward consciousness that no

[KING IS SHOT BY DICK TURPIN.]

No. 235.—Black Bess.

No. 236 will be Published next Thursday.

should never again be able to look upon that peaceful scene except in imagination.

Yet his determination was that if he could only succeed in performing the duty which he felt was owing to his comrades by himself, he would make his way back to this place, and pass the remainder of his life in it in humble retirement.

But another and different fate was in store for the highwayman.

The conviction upon his mind was destined to be realised.

He was in good truth taking his last look of that scene.

It cost him a great effort finally to tear himself away, but the time for departure came, and could not be delayed.

Returning to the cottage, he placed in the hands of the good woman all the money that he possessed.

The amount was considerable; but he gave it all to her without reserve, save and except that he bound her to tend Maud's grave as the other graves were tended, and to cause to be placed at the head of it a stone inscribed simply with the name of "Maud."

Inexpressibly mournful was this last duty, and more than once Dick felt as though he should break down under it.

It was therefore more with the view of concealing the emotion which he could not longer repress that he took his departure in a hasty manner.

On reaching the beach, however, he found the fisherman waiting for him.

The tide then was just upon the turn.

A little delay was caused in getting Black Bess aboard the boat.

For the first time, she seemed reluctant and unwilling to obey her master's bidding.

Rightly or wrongly, Dick ascribed it to the fact that she missed Maud, and was undesirous to proceed without being able to comprehend the reason of it.

This may have been only a fancy on the part of the highwayman; but it pleased him.

Had he felt disposed to chide his mare for her disobedience his emotion would not have suffered him to do so.

At last, however, Black Bess entered the boat; but having done so, she seemed to look back to the shore with a glance as wistful as her master's

Gradually the shore receded from their view; and as it grew more and more distant, Dick's heaviness of heart increased; and when at length darkness set in, and when there was no fear that he should be observed, Dick sank down to the bottom of the boat and gave way unrestrainedly to his grief—a grief a thousand times more poignant than any he had suffered in all the vicissitudes of his life.

CHAPTER MLXXXII.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN VERY UNEXPECTEDLY FINDS HIMSELF IN THE MIDST OF HIS FOES.

THE coast of England was gained in safety.

How long a period of time the voyage had occupied Dick Turpin knew not.

All the time he remained in the position we have just described—that is to say, crouching down in the boat in an attitude of overwhelming grief.

The fisherman, actuated by friendly motives, spoke to him once or twice, but no answer was returned.

The sudden jerk caused by the boat running on to the beach aroused him, however, and, with a powerful effort, he shook off the reflections that had weighed him down, and prepared himself to perform those duties which lay before him.

Springing from the boat with a swiftness and readiness that surprised the fisherman, Dick prepared to get Black Bess on shore.

This was done without much trouble, and, the boat having been hastily secured, they made their way towards the cottage.

"I cannot linger here," said Dick Turpin, "for every moment is of value. Still, I must fulfil the promise that I made to you. Can you obtain a horse?"

"There is a little inn not very far away," replied the fisherman, "where I might hire one."

"Then go at once. Be careful to say nothing about the purpose for which you require it. I will wait for you here. Be speedy," he added, as the man started off. "I shall be full of impatience till you return."

Dick did not enter the cottage, but remained on the beach caressing his noble steed.

Now that Maud had passed away, the tie that bound them together was drawn closer.

Black Bess was now the highwayman's dearest friend.

In spite, however, of his affection for her, his eyes very often looked yearningly across the vast expanse of dark, rolling water, and as he did so his heart would swell almost to bursting, for this was the first great grief that he had known, and therefore it was more deeply felt.

Although the fisherman made good speed, the time seemed terribly long until he returned; yet it was quite as well that this delay occurred, for it allowed the day to close in.

It was, however, little more than dusk when the pair set out in the direction of Stonehenge.

Dick was unconscious of the great amount of danger he was running, for he knew nothing of the movements of the police officers.

These individuals were, however, with a great deal of perseverance, searching in every direction for the highwaymen, and leaving descriptions of them at every habitation they perceived.

Had he known all this, Dick would scarcely have rode along the highway with so much indifference.

This bold course, as often happens, proved a safe one, for the old Druids' Stones were reached without the occurrence of any incident whatever.

Going, then, to that place where the booty had been deposited, Dick unearthed it.

The amount he placed in the hands of the fisherman far exceeded all expectation; but then it was not likely that Dick would underpay the person who had rendered him such a service.

The remainder of the wealth Dick bestowed about him, for he judged this would be the more prudent course, as who could tell what sudden emergency might arise?

The fisherman, having uttered a thousand protestations of gratitude, rode back to his humble dwelling, while Dick resolved to remain in his present quarters for a little while, in order that his mare might have food and rest.

It seemed a strange spot to choose for a resting-place; but then Dick judged that of all others it would be the one where the officers were least likely to look for him.

While speculating upon the possible whereabouts of his comrades, however, Dick little thought that scarcely twenty-four hours had elapsed since Tom King stood within a few yards of him.

Like Tom King, Dick Turpin, after some reflection, felt that London was the place where he would be most likely to hear tidings of the rest, and he resolved to make his way there with as little loss of time as possible.

Having once made this determination, he found it the most difficult thing in the world to restrain his impatience so far as to enable him to stay as long as he had intended.

For himself rest was out of the question.

He tried in vain to close his eyes in sleep—indeed, so great was his agitation that he was compelled to pace up and down like some wild animal chafing at confinement.

Long before it was dark, then, he was on his way to London.

With the utmost assurance he continued to keep on the highway.

He knew full well that this was the most direct road, and also that his mare would not be so fatigued in journeying along it as she would be if he attempted to take her across the country.

Plunged in deep thought, he paid but slight attention to what was going on around him, nor did he seem conscious of the rapid approach of darkness.

But he was destined to be aroused from his reverie in a manner more startling than agreeable.

All at once his ears were assailed by a loud shout.

There could be no mistaking the tone of it

It was a shout of surprise.

It was enough to make Dick look around him hastily, and as he did so a loud ejaculation escaped his lips.

He found, to his great surprise, that he was exactly in front of an inn of considerable extent.

The house lay at some little distance back from the high-road, and round the door a number of mounted men were clustered.

It did not require a second glance to prove that they were police officers.

Apparently they had halted there merely that they might take some hasty refreshment while in the saddle.

It was from them the shout of surprise had come, and the cause of it was the sudden and unexpected appearance of the highwayman.

"Dick Turpin," roared one of them, in accents of amazement, as soon as the shout of astonishment had died away—"Dick Turpin and Black Bess, by all that's d—nable!"

But before he had reached the conclusion of this ejaculatory speech the object of it had taken the alarm and was flying along the high-road at a speed which seemed to promise to make pursuit a hopeless matter.

Nevertheless, the police officers hastily dropped the jugs from which they had been drinking, while the one in command threw down some pieces of silver for the reckoning.

"Now, my boys," he said, "off and away! It is a long time since we had a chance of doing anything, so do not let us miss the present opportunity. Try your best. Now, then, forward—forward!"

This urging seemed, however, to be scarcely necessary, for the men, without exception, seemed full of anxiety to capture the highwayman.

They were, too, in the best of spirits.

Their horses were in good condition, having had a long rest, during which they had been well attended to.

They consequently seemed to stand a good chance of effecting their object.

As we have seen, Dick Turpin's astonishment lasted but a second.

The first thing he did upon recovering himself was to give Black Bess a sudden impulse forwards.

Gallantly was that impulse obeyed, and it was with a sudden thrill of pleasure that Dick thought of the splendid qualities of his matchless steed.

That exhilaration of the spirits which cannot fail to be felt while riding rapidly under circumstances of excitement soon told upon Dick.

For the moment all was forgotten.

His eyes brightened.

His breath came thick and short, while the warm blood leaped with a tingling motion through his veins.

He was dominated by an intense and ungovernable excitement.

Once again he felt himself the bold dashing knight of the road, fearing no danger, no matter how great, and laughing to scorn all attempts at pursuit.

But, despite the great speed that Bess made, the police officers could still be heard—though faintly—in the rear.

"They are better mounted than I could have believed," he muttered, as he glanced behind him.

But the darkness was too great to enable him to see far.

The unmistakable sound, however, produced by the concussion of many horses' feet upon the hard highway still came to his ears.

"They will try their hardest," he muttered to himself; "but it will be in vain. They have lent me a little stimulus, and the result probably will be that I shall reach London sooner than I should have done had I been left to myself."

The speed at which Black Bess was going, though a very rapid one, was, nevertheless, of such a character as she could maintain for a considerable length of time without much distress to herself.

But when several miles had been passed over in this manner Dick Turpin's first excitement abated, and he began to think with greater calmness upon the nature of his position.

"No, no," he said to himself, as he tightened the rein—"it won't do to keep up this kind of thing, for, if I do, the probability is that I shall enter London with the police officers after me like a pack of wolves! No, no—that will not answer."

Black Bess, feeling the check upon her bridle, very willingly obeyed it.

Her pace grew slower and slower until it reduced itself almost to a walk.

Dick was thinking.

Slight, however, as was the delay thus caused, it was of manifest advantage to the police officers, who still pushed on at the utmost speed their horses were capable of making.

Very faintly, but still growing louder and louder each moment, could be heard the hoofbeats of their horses in the distance.

"I must give them the slip," said Dick, again speaking half aloud. "It will be by far the wisest course; and yet how am I to accomplish it? What stratagem can I make use of that will be effectual? It must be something out of the ordinary course, for, rely upon it, they will not suffer themselves to be very easily thrown off the scent. What can it be? Thought eludes me! I do not feel capable of that invention which once came so readily to me. How they come on! Let it be how it will, some greater distance must be placed between them and me than there is already—nothing can be done in such close quarters as these. I will try another gallop. That, perhaps, may clear my brain of the vapours that now overcloud it. At any rate, by getting further off I shall be better able to put into execution whatever I may decide upon. Forward, Bess, old lass—forward once again, and give them a taste of your rare mettle!"

CHAPTER MLXXXIII.

DICK TURPIN CONCEIVES A VERY CLEVER SCHEME FOR ELUDING THE POLICE OFFICERS.

It often happened that Black Bess obeyed the bare words of command, as she did in this instance.

To all appearance she understood the words that were addressed to her, but probably the fact was she understood from the tone of her master's voice what it was that he required her to do.

When wishing her to make good speed, Dick always spoke in a lively and encouraging manner, and it was rarely that anything more was needed.

Having perfect confidence in her, he allowed the reins to lie quite loosely upon her neck, for in the matter of avoiding obstacles of all description he relied more upon her matchless instinct than upon the quickness of his own vision.

Never had Black Bess appeared to be in better condition.

Away she flew along the broad, well-kept high-road, with the ease and swiftness of a greyhound.

Very soon indeed did it become impossible to catch the least sound of his foes, but Dick kept on.

He was anxious to have the best possible opportunity to carry anything he might resolve upon into effect.

His brain was busily at work, but as yet his mind had failed him.

It did indeed seem as though he had lost that faculty upon which in times gone past he had so prided himself.

All at once Black Bess changed her position from the middle of the road to one side of it.

The darkness was so great that Dick could not see what had caused her to make this sudden movement.

By dint of straining his eyes, however, he made out a dark-looking object, which immediately resolved itself into a covered van, or, rather, cart, for it had but two wheels.

This vehicle was drawn swiftly and smoothly along by a powerful horse.

Dick was past it in a second of time, but before he had gone many hundreds of yards in advance he pulled up.

A thought had at last occurred to him.

It had been suggested by the cart.

The nature of it will soon be seen.

At present it was an idea merely, and it was impossible to say whether it could be carried into effect until the cart arrived.

For this event Dick waited with much impatience.

A rumbling sound soon assailed his ears, and finally, after the lapse of a few moments, the vehicle reached him.

"Hoy—hoy!" Dick bawled, in a loud voice. "Stop—stop, I say!—stop a moment! Hoy—hoy!"

His summons was heard, and the covered cart was brought to a standstill.

"Dang me," said a voice, "if I did not think it was a highwayman! Not that it would have siguified if it had been, because, you see, I am not such a fool as to travel with anything worth taking. He, he!"

"A very wise precaution," assented Dick.

"Yes—yes! I ax your pardon, sir, for having had such thoughts about you, sir, seeing as how you're a genelman. He, he'"

The person in the cart was evidently facetiously inclined.

Dick rode closer to the vehicle.

"I have stopped you," said Dick, "in order that I may ask you a question of great importance to yourself."

"Well, that's cool, at any rate! What may this question be?"

Dick spoke in a deliberate tone, for he wished to make an impression.

"I want to know whether you have any objection to earning a couple of hundred pounds in the next hour or so?"

"Eh?—what?" ejaculated the man, amazed in no slight degree. "Just be good enough to say that over again, will you?"

Dick complied, and, if anything, his voice was more deliberate and emphatic.

"It seems pretty clear," he replied, "that you take me for a d—d fool."

"How so?"

"Why, you must, or you would never ask me such a question."

"Then you are willing?"

"Certainly! But," he exclaimed, all at once, as though struck with a fresh thought, "you don't want me to commit murder, do you?"

"Certainly not!" said Dick, who could not help laughing at the tone of extreme anxiety the man employed.

"Nor rob, nor fire a rick, nor——"

"Nothing that you need fear any after consequences from."

"I'm your man, then. What is it?"

"Listen attentively."

"Don't be afraid about that."

"I want you, then, to take your horse out of the cart, unharness it, and turn it into that nice meadow over the hedge yonder. Do you understand that?"

"Well, I know what you want me to do, but as for understanding why it is to be done——"

"There is no occasion for you to trouble yourself about that—you shall know more in good time."

"Very good. What next?"

"You will then put the harness on my mare here—I think it will fit—and put her into the shafts."

"Put that mare of yours into my cart?"

"Just so."

"And what then?"

"Continue your journey."

"And what about my horse?"

"That will be safe enough in the meadow till you have the opportunity to come back and fetch it."

"And what should you do?"

"Ride with you in the cart."

"Where to?"

"Only just along the high-road."

"How far, though?"

"A mile or two."

"And what else?"

"That's all."

"All?" repeated the man, incredulously.

"Everything."

"But you don't mean to say that you are willing to pay a couple of hundred pounds for having that done, do you?"

"I am not only willing, but quite ready."

"Then there must be more in it than I am aware of."

"Undoubtedly there is."

"Then let me know it, or I'm off. I never buy a pig in a poke, as the saying is."

Dick debated for a moment within himself as to whether he should take this man into his confidence.

It would be a great risk to do so; but at the same time Dick felt that, could his plan be efficiently carried out, he would have an excellent chance of escape.

From the man's manner of speaking, too, Dick felt tempted to trust him.

What also weighed greatly with him was, that if this man did undertake it there was no doubt about his ability to play his part well.

"Well, guv'nor," interrupted the man, "how do you bring in the verdict?"

"I will trust you."

"Very good."

"Fully and entirely trust you."

"So much the better."

"In a word, then, I am pursued by police officers—they are hard upon my track, and by doing what I have just said I shall be able to escape them easily."

"I see now. And you are?"

"I may as well tell you, for half confidences are more dangerous than whole ones."

"True again."

"Then I am commonly known as Dick Turpin."

"Blest if I did not think so!" answered the man, without displaying any of that astonishment which the highwayman thought the announcement would call forth.

"You thought so?"

"Yes."

"And why, pray?"

"Why, by the looks of the mare of yours; and, besides, what you have proposed is just like one of your tricks."

"Well, be it so. Tell me whether you feel inclined to take two hundred pounds from me or not."

"I should not hesitate a moment," was the reply, "if I could make sure that I should get into no trouble about it afterwards."

"I don't think there is any need for fear. But you must make up your mind quickly, or I shall have them in sight."

The man considered for a moment or two; but the prospect of coming into possession of so large a sum as two hundred pounds overcame the scruples of prudence.

"In for a penny in for a pound," he cried at length. "I'll take you."

"Agreed," said Dick; and the very moment he pronounced the word he slipped from the saddle.

The man was not long in descending, and between them the horse was unharnessed and taken out of the cart in a very brief space of time.

Dick was in high spirits, for, having obtained the man's consent, he made sure of being able to baffle his foes.

As rapidly as possible he took off Black Bess's saddle and bridle, and threw them into the back of the cart.

While he was thus occupied the man took his horse by the forelock and led him through a gate into a meadow on the right-hand side of the road.

"There," he said, as he fastened the gate again, "you ought not to grumble at this little arrangement, for you are clearly a gainer by it."

The horse seemed to think so; for, as if to testify his satisfaction, he kicked up his heels and vanished into the darkness in a moment.

Nothing now remained but to put the harness on to Black Bess and place her in the shafts.

This did not take long, for the noble creature seemed to know that what her master most wanted of her then was docility.

It was really wonderful to notice how different Black Bess looked when harnessed to the cart.

The great, clumsy trappings formed for her an effectual disguise, and in the darkness there was little fear that the officers would be able to recognise her.

Dick Turpin was delighted beyond measure.

"Capital," he said, as he patted his mare upon the neck—"capital! We shall do the officers nicely! And hark! As I live, they are coming; we have not a moment to lose!"

The man listened.

"I can't hear them," he said.

"Very likely not; but then you must remember that you are not as well practised in listening as I am. If we linger here we shall hear them more than is desirable."

Dick climbed up into the cart, and the man hastened to follow him.

"Will you drive?"

"No," answered the highwayman; "I will get to the back of the cart and cover myself up with the straw; at the same time, I shall be able to look out at the back."

"Very good."

Black Bess showed herself quite tractable and quiet in harness.

No sooner did the man take hold of the reins than she jogged off as though she had never been used to any other employment in her life.

The canvas at the back of the cart consisted of a couple of flaps, and though these were tied together, yet space enough was left to allow Dick to peep through.

The cart rolled along at such a rate that Dick was obliged to say:

"Don't drive so fast, or you will excite their suspicions."

"Very good; though I do like to be behind a horse that can go."

Their speed was now somewhat diminished, and in consequence the sound made by the officers' horses could again be heard.

More and more distinct it became, and Dick was sure that they would overtake the cart in less than a quarter of an hour.

Just as he made the reflection the man called out to him.

"What is amiss?"

"Oh! nothing, only you have not told me what I shall say to the officers in case they should speak to me."

"Well thought of. The simplest thing will be to declare that no one answering my description has passed you, and, of course, they will conclude that I have made my way across the country."

CHAPTER MLXXXIV.

DICK TURPIN FINDS THAT HE IS BY NO MEANS OUT OF DANGER.

"Just as you please," replied the man. "You may depend that if it is agreeable to you it will suit me."

"Well, then, I am anxious to get to London as soon as ever I can, though I don't want to get there with a pack of officers behind me."

"I understand. And if you can once give them the slip you will push on along the road as fast as you are able?"

"Exactly."

"Well, all I can say is that it is a capital plan, and it ought to succeed."

"We shall soon know. The officers will be almost sure to stop you and make inquiries. You must be very careful, for if you excite their suspicions it will be all over with me."

"Oh, you leave Joseph to that. I was born before the middle of last week—I suppose you know that?"

"Yes; if I hadn't I should not have trusted you so far as I have already."

Dick now once more betook himself to his look-out at the back, for the sounds of the officers' approach became unmistakable.

Still, the darkness was too profound to permit him at present to get even a glimpse of them.

It was impossible for this state of things to continue very long, however.

The officers, as far as could be judged by the sound, were coming on as swiftly as ever.

At length, like a darkness, Dick could distinguish them behiud him.

He now began to feel conscious that, in the event of anything going wrong, his position was a very ticklish one.

Discovery would, in point or fact, be fatal to him.

It was this reflection that led the highwayman to ask himself whether he was not placing more confidence in this man than was justifiable.

Suppose he should play him false?

The probability was a terrible one to contemplate, and yet it was impossible for Turpin to close his eyes to it.

Indeed, the nearer the officers came the more did it obtrude itself.

He had no guarantee whatever of the man's fidelity, and the temptation to betray him was very great.

Not only was there the very considerable amount of the reward, but he held possession of Black Bess; and to a man fond of a good horse, the hope of being able to secure her would perhaps prove to be the greatest temptation of all.

"I won't leave the power all in his hands," muttered Dick, conclusively; "I will at least have some warrant for the safety of my life."

Just as Dick Turpin arrived at this determination the police officers came fairly into view.

Not only were the forms of themselves and the horses visible, but even their accoutrements could be distinguished.

"Joseph—Joseph!" whispered Dick.

"Hullo, captain!"

"Hush—hush! Speak low! The officers are close behind us!"

"All right. But you startled me a bit. The fact is, I was thinking."

It might have been the highwayman's fancy, but the driver appeared to manifest no little confusion or embarrassment.

"I have been thinking too," answered Dick, in a significant tone.

"Have you, captain?"

"Yes. Do you feel that?"

"Lor, yes! What is it?"

"A pistol!"

"Don't—don't!"

"Silence, I say! Just listen a moment, will you!"

"I can't with that horrid thing touching me. It's just like ice!"

Dick removed the pistol, though he took care to hold it so that it would be ready for immediate use.

"Now, I don't want to say anything unpleasant, you know," he whispered; "and you will forgive me for thinking that perhaps the idea had occurred to you that you might be able to make a better bargain than you have already."

"What do you mean, captain?"

"Why, simply as a mere matter of self-defence, I shall take such means as will effectually prevent you from giving the officers a hint that I am in the cart with you."

"But, captain, you don't think that of me, do you?"

"I should be sorry to have a bad opinion of anyone," answered Dick, "but in the present case my life compels me to adopt every precaution. Do you understand?"

"Quite."

"Then I am sure you will not take it amiss of me if I hold this loaded pistol ready in my hand, like this."

"There is no occasion."

"I hope there may not be; still," added Dick Turpin, in a resolute and even menacing tone, "if I have the least suspicion that you are about to play me false I'll blow the top of your skull off, and with as little hesitation as I should have in killing a sparrow. Those who know me best invariably give me credit for being as good as my word, and fear not that I shall make this matter an exception."

The man shuddered.

"Dang me!" he said. "If I'd a known I was going to drive with a loaded pistol at my back I would have seen you at the bottom of the Red Sea before you should have got into the cart at all!"

"If you mean well by me, you have nothing whatever to fear—you will be quite uninjured. If anything unpleasant takes place, you will have none save yourself to blame. But, hush! the officers are here—not another word! Remember what I told you. In answer to al their questions merely say that no one answering to my description has passed you on the road."

It was high time now to be silent, for the police were so near that there was great danger of their discovering that the cart was occupied by two persons should a word be uttered in a louder tone than a whisper.

Not more than a minute elapsed after this when some one called out, in a loud voice:

"Hullo, there! Pull up, will you?—pull up, in the King's name!"

The driver now brought Black Bess to a standstill.

The vital moment had now arrived.

It was scarcely possible for any human being in Dick's position to preserve anything resembling ordinary calmness.

The slightest thing would have served to discover him.

If the officers, prompted by suspicion or otherwise, merely glanced into the cart, his detection must have followed.

All he could do was to remain profoundly sti" and await the issue of events.

No sooner was the vehicle stopped than a police officer rode close up to it.

The others clustered around at a short distance, so that Dick might be said literally to be surrounded by his foes.

Certainly many of them were within an arm's-length of him.

"How far have you travelled?" asked the officer, in a hectoring voice.

"What do you want to know that for?"

"I demand the information in the name of the King."

"Very well, then, since you must know, I come from Meadbrook."

"Oh, ah! Meadbrook. Well, as you have been driving along the high-road, did you notice a man pass you riding on a black horse, and going at a violent gallop?"

"No."

"You have not?"

"I have not," answered the man, firmly, for the pistol behind him was prominent in his imagination.

"But perhaps you have been asleep?"

"It isn't likely."

"Then are you perfectly certain that no such person has passed you to-night?"

"Perfectly certain."

This answer evidently was a very different one to what the officers had expected, and produced no little confusion.

A consultation was immediately held.

Dick overheard the greater part.

"I told you so, sir," said some one, in a positive tone of voice—"something seemed to strike me that as soon as he got out of our sight he would make his way across the open country instead of keeping to the high-road."

"Then, if you thought so," rejoined the chief officer, "why the devil couldn't you say so at the time? What the devil is the good of telling us now it is too late?"

"I did not like to take the responsibility."

"D—n your scruples! You might have given your opinion."

"What do you think we had better set about doing? If we stay here long the scent will grow quite cold."

"I am afraid it's cold already," was the reply. "I should like to know whether anyone has a proposition to make?"

"I can't help thinking that he kept to the high-road," said another.

"But how could he have done so without being seen by the driver of this cart?"

"Perhaps it was made worth his while not to see."

"I'll tell you what, Mr. Officer," cried Joseph, "if you insinervates anything agen me, blowed if I don't get out of my cart and punch your head!"

"Don't be a fool!" said the chief officer. "Drive on. We will keep you company till you get to the inn yonder, and then we shall soon find out whether you have spoken the truth or not."

Having received this permission, the man set his cart in motion.

The officers rode along with it after the fashion of a guard of honour.

Dick was not aware of the proximity of any inn until the officer had alluded to the fact; and what had just been said by no means tended to make him feel easy in his mind.

He was just congratulating himself upon having got off so well when the inn was mentioned.

There was no help for it, however.

Being quite powerless, all he could do was to resign himself to Fortune.

Luckily for him, he was not destined to remain long in suspense.

With a sudden jerk, the cart a moment or two afterwards stopped in front of the inn.

Dick would have given much for the power to take a peep about him, but this was impossible.

Concentrating all his faculties into that of listening, he waited to hear what would next be said.

Some little confusion seemed to be going on in front of the roadside inn, and Dick afterwards found that the cause of this was that another troop of officers, who had come from the opposite direction, had stopped there to bait their horses.

Dick drew a long breath, and congratulated himself upon his narrow escape.

Had he not put his cleverly-conceived stratagem into execution nothing could have saved him from riding full tilt into this fresh party, and then his chances of ultimate escape would have been slight indeed.

But events were fated to fall out otherwise.

"We shall know the truth now," said the officer who had proposed making a halt at the inn.

"Yes, yes—to be sure we shall."

Then, addressing himself to the officer in command of this second troop, he asked:

"Any news of Dick Turpin?"

"Divil a bit!" was the reply, given in so strong a brogue as to leave no doubt upon the subject of the speaker's nationality.

"I hope you believe me now," said Jeseph, triumphantly. "If he had gone this way the officers must have seen him."

"Why do you ask, my jewel?" continued the officer belonging to the second troop. "Have you had any luck now?"

"We caught sight of Dick Turpin," was the reply.

"Tare and ouns!"

"We gave chase, and thought we had him on the road before us; but it seems pretty certain that he has given us the slip somehow."

"And what's that man in the cart to do wid it? Who's in there?"

"Oh, nothing! He told us Dick Turpin had not passed him, but we did not know what to do about believing him."

"But you believe me now, don't you?" asked Joseph, triumphantly.

"Yes."

"And I may drive on, I suppose?"

"Yes—if you like. What the devil do you want bothering me for?"

"Don't lose your temper, my friend," returned Joseph, imperturbably.

Then he added:

"Good night, gentlemen all. I wish you luck."

With these words he drove off.

Dick ventured to shift his position a little, and looked out at the back.

He could see the officers in front of the inn quite plainly; and it was perhaps merely his excited fancy which made him think that several officers gave suspicious glances at the retreating vehicle.

CHAPTER MLXXXV.

DICK TURPIN UNEXPECTEDLY RECEIVES SOME VERY IMPORTANT INTELLIGENCE.

Not for long, however, was Dick allowed to have even this partial glimpse of his foes.

A sudden bend in the high-road hid the inn completely, and so he was deprived of the opportunity of ascertaining whether his suspicions were well or ill-founded.

He listened for a little while, but finding all was silent, he ventured to draw a long breath upon finding himself out of so dangerous a position.

As for Joseph, he protested himself to be vastly pleased with the result of his stratagem, to the success of which he declared his own cleverness tended in no slight degree.

Dick ventured to uncock his pistol and to replace it in his pocket.

"Captain," said Joseph, descrying Dick's action, "I am heartily glad to see that ugly-looking thing out of the way. It was too bad of you to distrust me—I did not deserve it."

"So it seems. Give me your hand—there. And now forgive me for my doubts, which, groundless as they were, you cannot blame me for feeling."

"All right—all right: don't say another word about it. I rather think we are out of our difficulty now."

"I hope so."

"Don't you think we are?"

"Well, it is doubtful."

"But what do you think of doing, captain—and how am I to get my horse back?"

"Never mind that now—your horse will be all right, and I shall want you to let me ride in your cart a mile or two further yet."

"Very good."

"You say you like to be behind an animal that can go don't you?"

"Rather!"

"Then for the next twenty minutes the wheels of this cart will go round faster than ever they have gone before."

"You are going to put Black Bess upon her mettle?"

"Yes, and without distressing her either."

"And you will let me hold the reins?"

"Yes. Slacken them. That will do nicely."

The moment the man complied with these directions, Dick gave his old signal to his mare.

Before the sound had well-nigh left his lips, away she went at a pace that made their former speed seem miserably slow, although, as may be supposed, it was pretty considerable.

Joseph was so amazed and, withal, so delighted that he could do nothing but sit breathless and speechless holding the reins.

So terrific was the speed that the wheels seemed to bound from the road.

Sparks flew and stones were scattered on every side.

The cart was but ill adapted for such rapid locomotion, being very deficient in the matter of springs, so that it was by no means comfortable to sit in it.

Dick, however, just then was not very studious about comfort.

All he wanted was to get away from his foes as quickly as he was able—so that he could, indeed, make after pursuit utterly useless.

As for Joseph, he was in his element.

This furious rate was kept up for something like the period Dick had mentioned, and by that time, the reader may be sure, they had rattled over many miles.

Wishing now to resume the saddle, Turpin spoke to Black Bess, and in a moment she reduced her speed until it became a very gentle trot.

"Astonishing!" ejaculated Joseph. "You have got her under rare command, captain, and no mistake! Ah," he added, with a sigh, "what wouldn't I give for such a creature!"

The highwayman hardly liked the tone in which these last words were pronounced, but of course he made no allusion to the circumstance.

Leaning forward in the cart, he looked out right and left of him for a narrow turning down which he could drive for a few yards, so as to have the opportunity of removing Black Bess from the shafts without being seen by anyone who might chance to pass by.

Joseph seemed to guess his intention, for he remarked, rather hastily:

"Captain, do you know that I am within a couple of miles of my journey's end, which is the next market town we come to? Now, if you would drive to there before you took your mare out it would make a great difference to me."

"Indeed?"

"Yes; do you see, I should do my business, and borrow a horse from a friend, who would ride back with me in the cart until we got to the meadow where mine is, and then he would ride horseback to the town again."

While speaking these words, Joseph displayed so much eagerness, while seeming to suppress all symptoms of such a thing, that Dick's suspicions were revived with full force.

"Perhaps he has some deep-laid plan in his mind to attempt my capture," thought the highwayman to himself; "and yet I may do him a great injustice by harbouring such thoughts. At any rate, I will not run the risk."

Having arrived at this determination, he said, significantly:

"I shall pay you so liberally for the service you have done me so far that you will think nothing of the inconvenience of being left no more than two miles from your destination."

"Then you won't take me, captain?"

"I prefer not to do so. Just turn down that dark lane there on the left; we shall be nicely out of sight there."

Without another word, and without manifesting the least hesitation, Joseph obeyed the mandate.

The lane was narrow and miry, so that Dick soon had the vehicle brought to a standstill.

The task of taking Black Bess out of the shafts, and reinvesting her with saddle and bridle was very quickly performed; and then Turpin's next course was to produce some of the money of which he had about him so plentiful a store.

That he treated Joseph liberally the reader may be sure, for Turpin was about the last man on earth to underrate any service that was performed for him.

The amount, indeed, evidently exceeded the expectations which Joseph had formed himself.

"I shall leave you to look after yourself," were the highwayman's parting words. "I know very well that you are capable of doing so, but still, let me caution you, for your sake, not to let the police officers surmise what share you have had in my escape to-night."

With the last word on his lips, Dick rode away, leaving Joseph standing in the lane and looking very much as though he was in doubt of the reality of what had lately passed.

Turpin's intention was to push on with unabated speed, for Black Bess did not at present show any effects whatever from the exertions already made.

The course decided upon accorded well with Dick's own impatience; and not only that, it rendered him still safer so far as regarded those officers who were on the road behind him.

Ere long, however, he became sensible that Black Bess would be all the better for a brief rest and some slight refreshment, and accordingly he began to look about him for a roadside inn.

The hour was very late, and he had grave doubts as to whether he should find a place open.

Just, however, as he was making this reflection, he perceived a glimmering light ahead of him and hastened towards it.

As he had hoped, he found it to be just the place he was so anxious to meet with.

On a nearer approach, too, it became evident that he had arrived in the very nick of time, for a man was engaged in fastening the shutters.

This individual hearing the sound of a horse's feet, came forwards and proved to be the ostler.

All around was so perfectly quiet and apparently so free from alarm that Dick was tempted to alight.

He allowed his mare only a little hay, with some water with which had been mixed a small quantity of brandy.

"Now a whisp of hay," he exclaimed, taking hold of a handful.

He began rubbing Black Bess thoroughly from head to foot; and while he was thus engaged the ostler, pretending to be very indifferent, walked with his lantern towards the horse-trough.

Turpin did not pay any particular attention to his movements.

Had he done so, he would have seen the ostler hold the lantern close to a part of the great pump which was much whiter than the rest of the wood of which it was composed.

From time to time the ostler glanced towards Dick, who, having finished rubbing his mare down, comprehended what was going forward.

"Here," he said, "come and take your reckoning."

"I knows you," said the ostler, in an excited voice, and raising his lantern while he spoke.

"Then you have the advantage of me," answered the highwayman, carelessly.

"I wish I had!" was the muttered response. "Dick Turpin," he added, in a louder voice, "the officers are after you."

"Thank you! I was slightly aware of the fact," was the provokingly cool rejoinder.

"There's a bill up offering a reward for you at every inn and public place on this road. There are hundreds of people on the look-out for you."

"Then they will take a great deal of trouble without any profit to themselves, unless they should happen to possess an uncommon share of good sense, as I think you do."

"What do you mean?" asked the ostler, full of curiosity.

"Simply that here is a twenty-pound note for you, and all I want you to do in return for it is to know nothing at all about me."

"Right, captain," was the reply. "Give us the money, and trust to my honour; and to prove that I don't mean bad by you I will give you a little information that may prove valuable."

"Thanks. What is it?"

The ostler, having examined the bank-note by the insufficient aid of the lantern, folded it up carefully and placed it in his waistcoat pocket.

Then, lowering his voice, he said:

"Captain, I don't know whether you are aware of it, but there is a party of more than twenty police officers on the road before you."

"Before me? Are you sure?"

"Quite. They were all here not more than half an hour ago, and I heard them saying to each other that they intended to keep on quietly in the direction of London, making inquiries all along the road."

This was indeed important intelligence, and true beyond a doubt.

Dick stopped, uncertain what to do.

The ostler appeared to have a tolerably good idea of what was passing through his mind, for he said:

"Look here, captain, if you don't mind another flimsy I can tell you something much better worth your knowing still—that is if, as I suppose, you want to get to London."

The highwayman did not think it worth while to waste time by uttering any reply.

His sole answer was to produce a second bank-note of the same value as the first, and place it between the ostler's extended fingers.

It was perfectly well understood.

"Captain," he said, "I know the officers have taken the high-road. Well, you must know that there is, at a little more than three-parts of a mile from here, a turning. It is a cross-road, in fact."

"Well?"

"The turning is on the right-hand side as you go from here. Now, captain, if you will take that turning, and make good speed, you will be able to get in advance of your foes."

"Can it be possible?"

"It is perfectly true."

"But how—how?"

"Why, this cross-country road brings you out on the London Road many miles from here—in fact, I should think the distance saved is pretty nigh five miles, for the road goes cornerwise, you understand."

"The road is much used, then?"

"No—scarcely at all."

"How is that?"

"Why, people prefer the highway, especially at night, and the cross-road I am telling you of is very dark, by the reason that it goes for some distance through a very dense wood; then again, for the first mile or two, the ground underfoot is very bad, though it improves afterwards; but the chief reason is that, many years ago, every traveller who went that way was robbed, and several were murdered into the bargain. At last the robber was taken, and hung in chains near the scene of his crimes, which is about the most dismal part of all the road."

"I suppose so," said Dick, musingly.

"Of course, captain, you would think no more about such a thing as that than I should, and I would go that way alone and on foot at any hour of the day or night."

Although he did not confess it or even hint such a thing, the ostler's narration raised anything but comfortable thoughts in Dick's mind.

"And do you really believe," he said "that I can actually get on in advance of these officers that you tell me are now in front?"

"I am sure you can—unless all I have heard about your mare, Black Bess, is a jumped-up lie. Take my advice, captain, and try it. Any way, it will save you a good five miles, and that ought to be considered in a long journey."

"Certainly it ought."

Be off with you, then—don't waste another minute."

"You are sure the officers have not taken that way?"

"Quite sure—they know nothing about the road, and the entrance to it is so narrow and dark, that unless you keep a good look-out you will ride by without seeing it."

"Dick Turpin," cried a loud voice, with startling suddenness, "I know you, and have heard all! Surrender!"

The voice came from the inn, and, turning in the direction of the sound, Dick caught sight of the figure of a man.

Turpin merely laughed.

But there was a flash and a loud report; but as Black Bess had just set herself in motion, her rider and herself were quite unhurt.

"Away—away!" he cried.

Then, turning to look back, he saw that all the inmates of the inn appeared to be aroused.

"If you want me you will have to catch me!" he shouted at the top of his voice.

Black Bess gave a few prodigious bounds, which had the effect of carrying her out of sight of the inn in a moment.

CHAPTER MLXXXVI.

DICK TURPIN MEETS TOM KING AT OLD MATTHEW'S IN DRURY LANE.

As Dick Turpin was under no apprehension concerning whatever pursuit might be set on foot by the people at the roadside inn, he reduced his mare's speed, for he wanted a little quiet thought, a thing impossible of attainment when Black Bess was going at full speed.

If it could be relied on, the importance of the information given by the ostler could scarcely be over-estimated.

But could it be relied on?

That was the point.

Dick somehow felt doubtful and distrustful.

Suppose that this road he was advised to take should turn out to be an ambush, or perhaps lead him blindly into the arms of those he was anxious to avoid?

Long and anxious was the consultation which Dick held with himself.

If he could only have obtained some evidence confirmatory of what the ostler had said, the case would have been different, but this was what there seemed to be no probability of obtaining.

Turpin's indecision was, if anything, rather greater than otherwise when he reached the turning in question.

The ostler had very correctly described it, for it was narrow, dark, and more than half concealed.

Judging by appearances, it must have been long since anyone had gone in that direction.

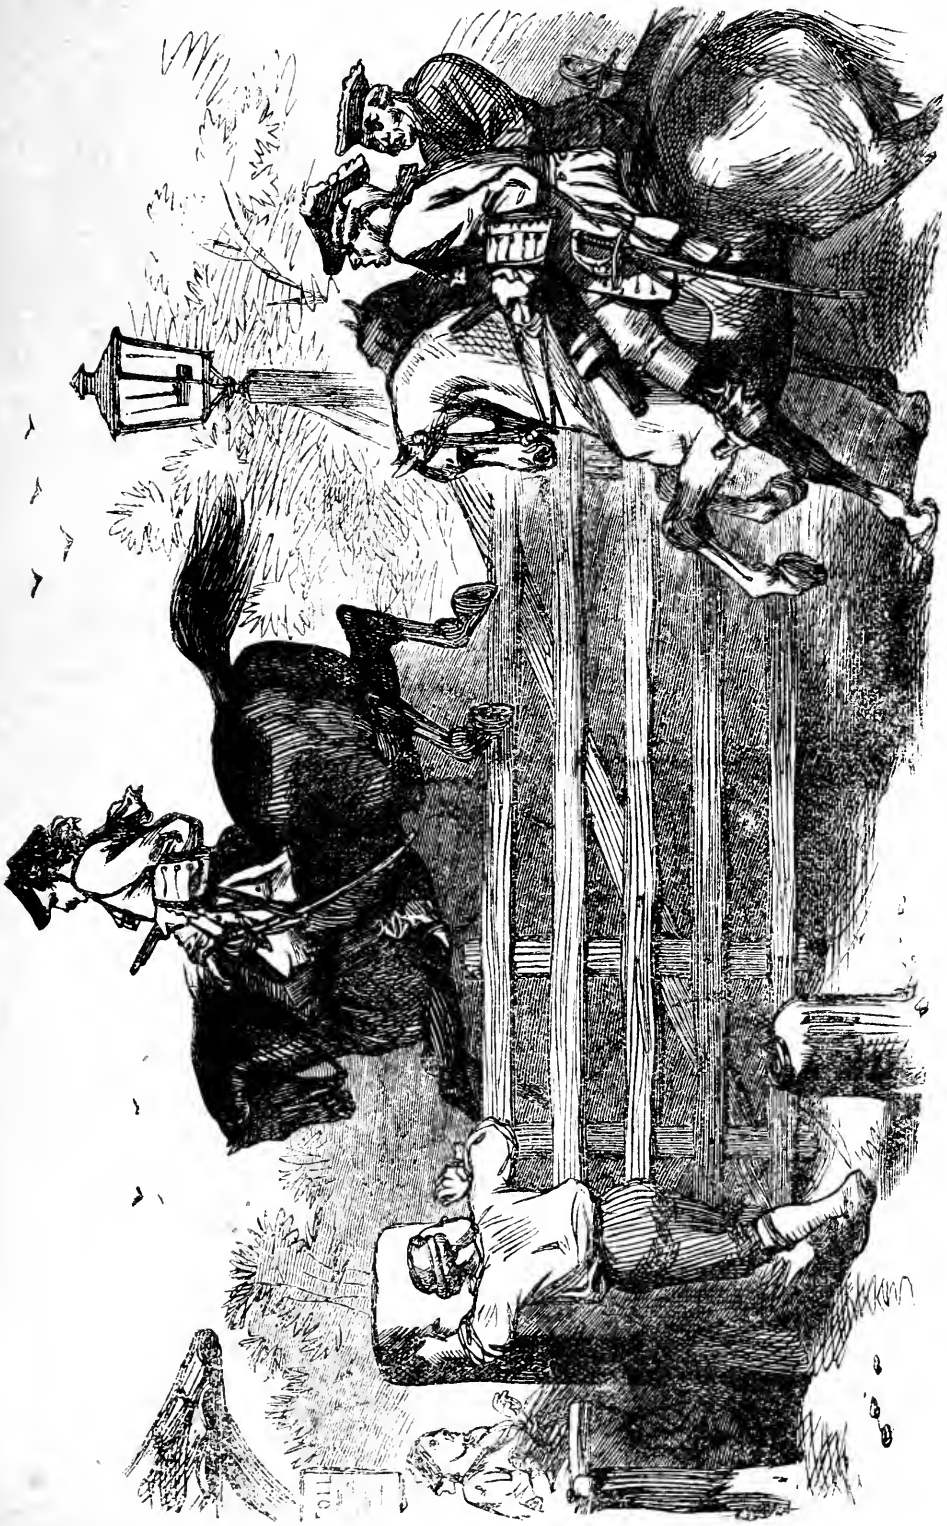
"I can at least tell whether the officers have gone down here," Dick muttered; and at the same moment he dismounted.

We have often stated that he never failed to carry about with him the means of procuring a light readily.

In a moment or so he had lighted a small lantern, which, nevertheless, emitted a bright though concentrated light.

By the aid this afforded Dick narrowly examined the ground at the entrance of the lane, or, rather, cross-road, and the result of his scrutiny was the conviction that no considerable body of mounted men had gone in that direction.

So far, then, the ostler had spoken truly; but yet Dick's suspicions were by no means allayed.



The lane, so far from communicating with the high-road, might have no outlet, in which case he might fall an easy prey to any officers who should follow him.

To remain in this state of hesitation, however, would never do, and, therefore, he hastened to come to a conclusion.

"I will go a little way in this direction," he said to himself, extinguishing the lamp and reseating himself in the saddle "and if I find that the appearance of the road does not correspond with the ostler's representations I will quit it and make my way across the country."

This resolution was no sooner formed than it was put into practice.

The lane being fenced in by masses of trees on both sides, was intensely dark; but Dick trusted to the finer instincts of his mare to keep him out of any danger that might lie in their path.

[DICK TURPIN ON THE ROAD TO YORK.]

Black Bess galloped on apparently with the utmost confidence.

It was a terrible thing to be carried so swiftly through the darkness; but Dick did not attempt to check her speed.

All at once, however, he came to a spot which, when compared with the rest, seemed tolerably light

He was just able to see about him.

Black Bess, with abated speed, went on, but kept drawing nearer to one side of the road.

Straining his eyes in the hope of being able to discern the cause of this, the highwayman perceived the gibbet of which the ostler had spoken.

It was not possible by the eye alone to make out the details of the object swinging from the short crossbeam, but imagination easily served to fill in the outlines.

A sickening feeling came over Dick's heart as he averted his eyes and urged his mare to make good speed past the loathsome spectacle.

No sooner was the gibbet behind her than Black Bess started off at a speed which seemed to be the effects of terror.

A considerable tract of open country now stretched far away on both sides of him, and the apprehensions in which Turpin had indulged almost if not entirely vanished.

Encouraged by the belief that he should, after all, succeed in getting in advance of the large troop of officers, he did not hesitate to push his mare onward, although morning now was not far distant.

But he judged that the officers, after having been on the road all night, would rest during the day at the first inn they came to after sunrise.

It was this belief that made him so anxious to make the best use of the time there was before him, in spite of the risk of doing so.

Every step he went now seemed to convince him that the ostler had acted towards him in perfectly good faith, and this made him hope that he would escape any dangerous consequences for having befriended him.

A dim gray light was visible in the east when Dick found himself in proximity to the London Road.

Considerable caution was now requisite, or he might precipitate that which he had been at so much pains to avoid.

He reconnoitred carefully before he ventured to emerge.

His joy may be perhaps understood when he saw that the coast before him was quite clear.

He drew from it the most favourable auguries of the success of the rest of his adventure.

And now, strangely enough, as he found himself apparently unmenaced by any pressing danger, that flow of spirits he had experienced suddenly ebbed away, and he once again became lifeless and dejected.

It really seemed as though, by some mysterious agency, Black Bess was acquainted with the change in her master's manner, for her head dropped, and she evinced unmistakable signs that the night's exertion had not failed to produce an effect upon her.

Great as was Dick's abstraction, it was not long before he noted this circumstance, and it awoke him to the necessity of finding good quarters for her somewhere during the approaching day.

But where was he to look for them?

How could he hope to find them on a road that had been so closely watched by the police officers?

Still, this was imperative if he wished to get rapidly to London.

He was anxiously debating upon the subject when the sun rose and the day fairly began.

Ere long the rural population would be abroad, and the appearance of a travel-stained rider and jaded steed could not fail to attract their special notice.

Yet no place holding forth the slightest prospect of safe shelter for a few hours could be descried, although now objects could be distinguished afar off.

Dick's attention was distracted from the consideration of this difficulty by seeing a man some distance off riding upon a horse, or rather cob, which, despite its short, clumsy-looking make, was tearing over the ground at a gallop which few hunters could have equalled.

Dick's first thought was that this man was hurrying towards him with hostile intentions, and his hands involuntarily sought his pistols.

But before he drew one of these weapons from his belt he saw that his opinion was erroneous.

The man was coming towards him, it is true; but as he came nearer, Dick perceived readily enough that he was being carried along entirely against his will.

The cob, in fact, was running away, and apparently had the bit firmly between his teeth, so that it was impossible to check his mad career by tugging at the reins.

Dick stopped abruptly.

For the moment he forgot everything in the intense interest he felt in this fresh spectacle.

It was impossible for him to render any aid—all he could do was to remain a spectator.

The scene did not continue long, however.

A tall, quick-set hedge dividing the fields from the roadside came in the cob's way.

Either the animal was too terrified to see the obstacle, or else it thought it could be surmounted.

At any rate, on it came at undiminished speed; but when within a couple of yards from the hedge-row it stopped short, as though arrested by the powerful hand of some enchanter, planting its fore feet most doggedly upon the ground.

The result of this sudden stoppage can be imagined.

Away flew the rider over the horse's neck, executing a kind of half-somersault over the hedge, and finally dropping head foremost into the road.

Here he lay like one deprived of life, while the cob, as though quite unconscious of the mischief it had done, turned round and trotted composedly across the meadow.

All this happened with extreme rapidity.

Indeed, it seemed to Dick that not more than half a moment had elapsed since he first caught sight of the terrified animal.

Under such circumstances as those in which the highwayman was placed, he might have been pardoned if he had continued on his way.

But Dick was not so inhuman.

As soon as ever he recovered from the first shock of his surprise—and this was not long—he hastened to place himself at the side of the prostrate man.

His worst fears were not realised, for he found him recovering possession of his senses.

Dick did what he could to restore him, and when he had to some extent succeeded, the farmer—for such by his costume he appeared to be—broke out into violent maledictions, not launched at his preserver, but at the beast which had served him this scurvy trick.

"I don't know who you are, sir," he said, addressing Dick, after a moment or two had elapsed; "but you are a Christian, and I am much obliged for your kindness."

"Oh, don't mention such a trifle. I hope you are not much hurt."

"No—no," answered the farmer. "I fell clear on to my head, so I think there is not much the matter."

The satisfied tone in which this remark was made brought a smile to Dick's lips.

Having thus spoken, however, the farmer endeavoured to gain his feet, and, in the effort that he made, appeared to become sensible that he was more injured than he imagined.

Nevertheless, by Dick's assistance, he at length stood erect.

"I feel very dizzy about the upper storey," he remarked, placing his hand to his head; "but I shall get over that in a moment or two, I think."

But the farmer seemed to get worse.

"It is a thousand wonders you were not killed," remarked Dick. "Is there anything that I can do for you? If so, speak."

"Do you mean what you say?"

"Certainly."

"Then that emboldens me to utter a request which otherwise I should not think of making."

"What is it, then?"

"Why, if you would help me up on to your horse, and lead me home—it is only a little way from here—I shall be always indebted to you, for, to tell the truth, I am afraid I am more hurt than I thought at first."

"I hope not," said Dick; "but I comply with your request most readily."

"Many thanks. One of these days I hope I shall be able to return the obligation."

"You can easily do so at the present moment."

"How, sir?—my good sir, how so?" asked the farmer, eagerly, who by this time had succeeded in seating himself upon the back of Black Bess.

"Show me the way," answered Dick, "and I will tell you as we go along."

The farmer indicated the position of his house, and Dick, without an instant's delay, set off in that direction.

The farmer had a little difficulty in retaining his seat, for his brain reeled.

Still, he professed himself most anxious to become acquainted with Dick's request.

"I am journeying to London," said Turpin, "and have been travelling all night. When I saw you I was looking out for a place where I could find shelter for a few hours for myself and steed, so if you will not mind according me your hospitality for a little——"

The farmer interrupted him.

"You are welcome to the best my house affords," he said, heartily, "and doubly welcome. This is a poor favour to render in return, however."

"Not at all so—not at all so."

At this moment Dick came in sight of a substantial-looking farm-house, which, although situated not very far from the high-road, was, nevertheless, concealed from it by some rising ground.

"That is your home, I suppose?"

"It is. We shall soon be there now. Curses on the brute! I'll have it shot, I will."

The approach of Dick was noticed by the inmates of the farm-house, who came out with their faces expressive of the greatest curiosity and alarm.

An explanation was soon given, and a surgeon thereupon immediately sent for, though the farmer resolutely protested against it.

He maintained stoutly that he should come round in a minute or two; but he kept getting paler, and before he had fairly crossed the threshold he almost swooned.

But he was most particular in giving instructions that Dick should be treated with the utmost hospitality, and not allowed to want for anything.

The highwayman could not help congratulating himself upon having got into such comfortable quarters, although it had been at the expense of a serious injury to the farmer.

Dick would not suffer any attentions to be shown to himself until the farmer had been thoroughly attended to, and while this was done he occupied himself in looking after his mare.

When he returned to the house, however, he found a substantial and tempting repast awaiting him, to which he did ample justice.

After that he retired to a bed-chamber, having first ascertained that the worthy farmer appeared to be considerably better.

As for Dick, he was terribly fatigued; and now that there was a prospect of rest, he seemed to become doubly sensible of it.

Fastening his door, he flung himself, dressed as he was, upon the bed, and no sooner had he assumed a recumbent position than he fell fast asleep.

His slumber was so profound that no ordinary noise would have been capable of arousing him from it.

This was not surprising, for he had by no means recovered from the effects of his illness, and a long time had elapsed since he had taken any proper rest.

He continued to sleep undisturbedly until just when evening was beginning to close in.

Then he awoke and made his way downstairs.

He was glad indeed to find the farmer sitting by the fireside; and by his manner it could be told that he was much better.

That good cheer and hospitality for which England is celebrated was shown to Dick, who was strongly urged to prolong his stay.

But this he declared impossible, owing to the urgency of his business.

Just as he was about to quit the house he perceived a small party of officers approaching.

Doubtless this was a portion of a larger troop which had been sent to the farm-house upon the chance of obtaining some information.

Dick drew back at once.

"Show me a back way to the stables," he said, addressing one of the farmer's sons; and then, very much to the surprise of all present, he added:

"Some men are coming across your fields who seek my life. If you wish to increase my obligations to you, you can do so by telling them that you have not seen anyone answering to my description."

These words caused so much surprise, that Dick, despite his danger, could not help feeling a little amazed.

However, before the farmer and his family could recover themselves, he followed the young man to whom he had first spoken, and who was waiting impatiently for him.

Just as the back door was closed, Dick heard a loud knocking at the front.

As the stables were situated in the rear of the farm-house, it was easy enough to gain access to them unseen.

As if to favour Dick's flight, too, a thick white mist had arisen from the meadows, which had the effect of making everything look indistinct.

The quickness with which Dick saddled and bridled Black Bess elicited the admiration of the farmer's son, who had never before been witness of such expedition.

In another instant Dick was in the saddle and making his way across the meadows, the vapour upon which quickly hid him from sight, while the soft turf made the strokes of his mare's hoofs almost inaudible.

Black Bess seemed as full of fresh vigour as her master, evincing not the least signs of having journeyed so far already.

"Luck is on my side," Dick ejaculated, when he at length emerged upon the high-road at a point nearly a dozen miles distant from the farm-house. "I have missed the grabs nicely, and now then for a speedy journey to London."

Before starting, however, he listened with the utmost intentness; and as the night was a calm one, he was convinced that his foes were nowhere very near to him.

This point ascertained, he did not hesitate to give Black Bess the rein.

Once more, then, did this matchless steed stretch along the high-road as though animated by the same impatience as her rider.

Fain would we continue to describe her gallant progress, but it was not diversified with any incident of sufficient importance to warrant us in doing so, and moreover, many important stirring incidents are waiting for recital.

It must suffice to say, then, that Dick performed the remainder of his journey safely and with little trouble, for the officers did not appear to be so vigilantly on the look-out as he got nearer to London.

Both Bess and himself were tired, but he continued to push on, for his anxiety to reach his destination grew greater as he got nearer and nearer to it.

It thus happened that he gained no intelligence whatever concerning the fate of his two comrades.

He entered London, too, by an easterly direction, and made his way, by various unfrequented roads with which he was familiar, to that narrow passage which we have so often made mention of, and with which Old Matthew had communication by means of a private door.

There was a time when the narrow passage was constantly and closely watched by the police; but Dick on the present occasion did not hesitate to enter it, for he judged that there could not possibly be the least suspicion existing that he was in London at all.

When he paused near the old familiar doorway, many and strange were the thoughts which passed through his mind.

A long time had elapsed since his last visit, and he had no certain knowledge that Old Matthew would be there, for he could not tell whether he had escaped the consequences attaching to his communication with Tom Davis, about whose fate Dick was most anxious.

Whether Matthew was still at his old quarters or not was a point which he felt would be quickly ascertained, for having found the concealed handle of the bell, he pressed upon it.

Hardly a moment elapsed before what seemed to be a portion of the solid wall receded, and Old Matthew stood before him.

At the very first glance Dick saw that Old Matthew's countenance had upon it an expression such as he had never seen it wear before.

But ere he uttered a word or allowed the landlord time to recover from his amazement, he entered, leading Black Bess by the bridle.

His next action was to close the secret door behind him.

Then, and not till then, did he venture to speak.

"Why, Matthew," he exclaimed, forcing a gaiety which he was far indeed from feeling, "is this the best face you can show to me after so long an absence?"

Then perceiving that the horror-struck expression upon his friend's countenance intensified, Turpin's assumed gaiety vanished instantly, and intense anxiety took its place.

Old Matthew's silence and strange manner struck a chill to his heart.

He felt sure that some dire calamity had happened, and therefore prepared himself to hear some terrible announcement.

But still he was far from imagining anything half so awful as what had happened.

Old Matthew too, who could scarcely believe that Dick Turpin was ignorant of the disasters of that day, was in the highest degree amazed at the strangeness of the highwayman's behaviour.

Thus they stood for some moments regarding each other in silence.

Old Matthew, after many efforts, succeeded in finding his voice.

"Is it—can it be possible that—that——"

"What?" cried Dick, his impatience and dread now amounting to absolute agony. "Speak—speak out at once! You have something terrible to tell! Out with it, man! I am prepared, and can bear anything but suspense!"

"But surely you must have heard——"

"I have heard nothing!" interrupted Dick, hastily.

Matthew groaned deeply, and wrung his hands.

"Then from the bottom of my heart," he said, "do I wish it had fallen to the lot of some one else to have to tell you. Stand firm, Dick, the shock will be dreadful, for I can tell that though you think yourself prepared, you have no conception of what has happened. Tell me, will you endeavour to stand firm?"

"I will—I will!"

"Then," said Matthew, hanging down his head and speaking in a hollow, stifled voice, "Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval are—are—Heaven help me!—dead—both dead—quite dead!"

CHAPTER MLXXXVII.

RELATES THE EVENTS WHICH FOLLOWED THE ARRIVAL OF THE HIGHWAYMEN AT THE WHITE HORSE INN.

Had Old Matthew's words possessed some instantaneous petrifactive effects they could not have made Dick stand more stone-like than he did.

Not a muscle moved, but he stood with dilated eyes gazing upon the landlord.

This first shock being over, a feeling of absolute incredulity succeeded.

Surely his ears had played him false, or else what he had believed to be recent, real events were no more than the vagaries of a distempered dream.

Claude and Jack dead!

The fact seemed too monstrous to be true.

He would almost as soon have believed that he was himself in a state of non-existence.

Yet some kind of horrible consciousness that the appalling intelligence he had just received was indeed only too true chained his tongue.

Fain would he have questioned his old friend, but for a long time his voice resolutely refused to perform its office.

But his glance was so terribly expressive that had Matthew but once looked up, he would have been able to understand it as easily as spoken words.

The landlord, however, was too much overcome to look up, or, indeed, to make a movement.

But at last Dick managed to articulate.

"Again—again, Matthew—tell me that again! Unless you do, I must believe that my ears played me false! Again—again, I say!"

"It's all true, Dick—there is not room for even the shadow of a doubt."

"Both dead?"

"Yes, and buried, too, by this time."

"Good Heavens!" ejaculated Dick, with a deep groan.

"I thought you must have known something of it."

"No, no—I have only just arrived, after having sustained the most terrible of all losses."

"Losses?" echoed Matthew; and as he pronounced the word he glanced towards Black Bess.

Dick understood him.

"No, no," he said—"I do not refer to her. It—it is Maud I mean."

"Maud?"

"Yes."

"What has happened to her?"

"She is dead," he replied, with a burst of emotion which he tried in vain to control.

"Calamity on calamity!" muttered Matthew. "And where is Tom King, I wonder, all this time?"

"What is that you say about my old comrade?" asked Dick, removing his hands from his face, for he had caught the sound of his name.

"I was wondering where he could be."

"Do you not know?"

"No. Do you?"

"I have not heard of him since our parting at Stonehenge."

"A dreadful business that," said Matthew, shaking his head. "I shall always blame myself for having had some share in that catastrophe."

"But Tom is not dead, is he?"

"Not to my knowledge. He has not been heard of since the time you mention."

"Then I fear the worst, for I know he was badly hit."

Matthew made no response.

It seemed as though he had his own forebodings, but did not like to give them utterance.

As though anxious to divert the subject, he cried:

"Come, Dick, we will not remain here. Take hold of Bess by the bridle. We will lead her to her old quarters."

Dick prepared to comply without uttering a word.

"He seems heedless whether there is danger or not," Matthew said to himself, as he opened the door communicating with the stable.

Then, in a louder voice, he added:

"I don't feel much afraid that the officers will trouble us to-night, Dick, they are too full of the business they have done. Rely upon it, a day or two's quiet will follow."

But Dick's thoughts seemed too much absorbed for him to give such matters as these any consideration.

Black Bess, in fact, came in for a greater share of neglect than he had ever before shown her.

He was like one who had been stunned by a heavy blow and had only partially recovered from the effects of it.

But the mare having been properly attended to, Matthew took hold of the highwayman's arm and led him towards that door we have so often described, which formed a means of communication between the yard and the private parlour behind the bar.

Dick sank down helpless, and went into the first chair he came to, and then, in a hollow, murmuring voice, he said:

"Now, Matthew, if you feel sure from interruption, sit down and tell me all this horrible business from first to last. I know nothing of the movements of my comrades after we separated at Stonehenge."

Dick Turpin having thus spoken, bent forward in his seat, and placing his elbows upon his knees, covered his face with his hands and prepared to listen.

Before, however, the landlord could collect himself for the commencement of his sad recital, some one tapped lightly with their fingers against the door leading into the bar, which was no longer half-glass as formerly, but composed entirely of wood.

It hardly seemed possible that Dick Turpin had not heard this sound; but if he had he took no notice of it, though by the look of Old Matthew it would seem as though there was danger to be apprehended.

"Keep quiet," he said; "I will just run out and see what is the matter. You shall have timely warning if there should be any danger."

But to all appearances his words fell upon unheeding ears, for Turpin neither moved nor spoke.

Matthew hastily opened the door and passed through, closing it carefully and quickly after him.

But another surprise awaited him.

Standing at the bar window was Tom King.

It was not possible to be in any doubt as regarded his identity, but he looked so pale, so thin, so worn, and haggard, that Matthew's first impression was that the highwayman's spectre stood before him, and not himself.

Tom observed his astonishment, and smiled faintly.

"Do you take me for a ghost, Matthew? You look as scared as though you do. Don't be alarmed—I am here in the flesh, though terribly worn out. I want the captain."

By the time Tom King had finished speaking these words Old Matthew had recovered himself.

Quick as thought, he rushed across the bar and, opening the door, bade Tom enter.

Then, without giving him time to say a word, he dragged him to the inner door, opened it, and pushed him over the threshold.

The noise thus made caused Dick to look up.

He recognised his old comrade at a glance.

He sprang up with an ejaculation of joy and thankfulness upon his lips, and the next instant he had clasped Tom's hands in both his own.

Old Matthew prudently bolted the door to secure them from interruption, whilst at the same time he implored them to make as little noise as possible.

The meeting was most unexpected on both sides.

The satisfaction both experienced at this reunion for the first few moments rose superior to everything else.

But Tom's first inquiries brought Dick to a remembrance of the calamities which for the moment it may be said he had forgotten.

The questions served to show that he was quite ignorant of the fate which had fallen upon his companions.

Again it became necessary for Matthew to break the awful intelligence, for Dick was wholly incapable of the task.

As the reader will readily suppose, Tom King was not less affected by this appalling news than Dick himself.

Like him, he was at first absolutely incredulous.

After their long association, it seemed impossible that there should come such a sudden and violent cessation.

Like Dick, also, he did not yet realise that he had indeed looked upon the countenances of his faithful allies for the last time.

"I was just about to tell the captain all the particulars of what had happened when I heard that tap at the door."

"Do you think we shall be interrupted?"

"No, not to-night. The officers are all too busy congratulating themselves upon what has happened."

Tom shuddered.

"I forget to say," he added, after a brief pause, "I left my horse outside."

"What! in the street?"

"Yes."

"That was highly incautious. Who is in charge of it?"

"No one."

"No one?"

"No; the poor animal has come too many miles for me to be at all afraid that she will run away."

"She must be seen to," said Matthew. "If the officers should see her they will, of course, suspect——"

He did not stop to finish the sentence, but abruptly left the room.

Dick Turpin and Tom King were now alone.

"This is a dreadful business, Dick," said the latter. "How did it all happen?"

"Do not ask me. I have no idea of the particulars. Matthew was about to tell them to me when you came."

"True—I remember."

"But there is another calamity still."

"Another?"

"Yes, one that you have not heard of."

"Is Maud concerned in it?"

"Yes," said Turpin, his voice almost choked.

"I feared so."

"For what reason?"

"Because I fancied that the wound she had received was mortal."

"It proved so."

"Then you have my sincere pity, Dick."

"I know it. But I feel as though life had no longer a charm for me."

"And so do I."

"But you have experienced no loss."

"True; but yet I have a kind of dread upon my mind which I cannot get the mastery of."

"A dread?"

"Yes. Do you remember the prophecy?"

"Prophecy—prophecy?"

"I can tell you do not. I mean about me being destined to die at your hands."

"Pooh, pooh, Tom! Cast aside such foolish thoughts. I would sooner believe that Old Matthew is destined to betray us to the police."

"Hark! he comes."

At this moment the landlord entered.

He looked rather more cheerful than he had done hitherto.

"The coast is clearer than I had hoped to find it!" he exclaimed. "The officers must be holding high revel somewhere; there has not been one seen outside all the day."

"They must imagine we are away from London," said Tom.

"Depend upon it, they have no suspicion of your being here; and such being the case, I have no doubt you will be able to remain unsuspected some time—that is, if you wish to do so."

"We hardly know what we wish for at present."

"No—no, certainly not. However, your horses are both in perfect safety, and yet where you can have them again almost in a moment if you wish."

"Thanks—thanks!" said Turpin, displaying a little impatience. "But, come, sit down and satisfy our curiosity."

"I will."

Matthew seated himself between the highwaymen, who prepared themselves to listen with the closest attention to every word which might fall from his lips.

As the reader is already acquainted with all the particulars connected with Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, it would be nothing more than waste of time to set down what Matthew said.

And the reader will easily understand what sort of effect was produced upon the two highwaymen by what they heard.

When they were informed of the manner in which Claude had been struck down their indignation knew no bounds.

At first they refused belief altogether, but Matthew assured them that what he said was quite correct.

"I could do nothing in the matter," the landlord added, in conclusion. "Every movement I made was watched with the utmost closeness. Strive as I would, I could not escape their scrutiny. They seemed as though quite certain that if any attempt at rescue would be made it would be organised here. I was in momentary expectation of seeing you, yet I dreaded to do so, for I thought if you approached this quarter your fate, too, would be sealed."

The discussion upon what had happened was prolonged to a very late hour; or, rather, an early one, for day was close at hand when the conference broke up.

Matthew then proposed that they should retire to rest.

"I have a couple of good rooms upstairs," he said, "which are quite at your service, and I should recommend that you remained in them. I don't believe anyone has seen you enter the house; and if you do not come downstairs, and I only allow those who can be trusted to go up, I don't see why you should not remain undetected for a long time."

"There seems every probability of it, Matthew," said Dick. "And some little time will be necessary for us to talk matters over and decide upon what is to be done."

"Certainly!"

"Moreover, we are both weak and ill—our nerves are shattered; but if we have a little quiet we shall soon get something like ourselves again, I hope."

"So do I. Come, follow me!"

The landlord led the highwaymen upstairs.

The rooms of which he spoke were at the top of the house, and the windows were so placed that it was impossible for any of the people in the neighbouring houses to look through them

Thus there did indeed seem some chance that the highwaymen would have a brief period of rest and quiet after the terrible events which had recently occurred, for on Old Matthew's fidelity they could thoroughly rely.

CHAPTER MLXXXVIII.

DICK TURPIN LEARNS THAT THE REWARD OFFERED FOR HIS APPREHENSION HAS BEEN DOUBLED.

When Dick Turpin said that both himself and his companion were weak and ill he spoke truly, for both of them were reduced to what might almost be termed the last stage of physical and mental prostration.

With Tom King this was particularly the case.

The reader knows how severely he was wounded, and, for recovery, rest of body and peace of mind were strongly needed.

So far, however, from being able to avail himself of these means of restoration, he had been compelled to go through exertion of the most violent kind, and then, at last, he had received two terrible mental shocks.

Dick Turpin could scarcely be called any better.

Conversation with his old comrade, with whom he had been so long separated, had no charm, and as soon as ever Old Matthew had left, Dick threw himself upon one of the beds, and either fell fast asleep or else gave himself up to deep reflection.

Tom saw he was in no humour to be spoken to, and therefore followed his example.

Both felt themselves for a time out of danger, for Old Matthew would not fail to give them timely notice if any officers came near.

Thus things remained until late in the day; even then they might not have aroused themselves if Matthew had not entered.

He had not overlooked the necessities of his guests, and carried before him on a tray a substantial and tempting repast, which he had prepared with his own hands.

His entrance aroused the two highwaymen, who came eagerly into the outer room, inquiring whether all was well,

"Yes—yes," said Old Matthew, "everything is perfectly quiet, so sit down and enjoy this meal in peace; I am sure you must want something."

"You are a real friend, Matthew."

"I am glad you think so."

"And have the officers resumed their watch?"

"What, upon these premises?"

"Yes."

"At present I think I may venture to say they have not."

"All has been quiet, then?"

"Perfectly so."

"That is encouraging."

"Very. I hope you will be able to remain in peace until you become once more like yourselves."

"Ah! Matthew," said Dick, with a heavy sob, "after what has happened it is in vain for you to expect that we shall be anything like what we have once been."

Tom King assented with a gloomy shake of the head.

"Well, well, we shall see," answered Matthew. "Sit down to the table, and do not forget that there is an old proverb which says Time works wonders."

"It may be true," said Dick, with a slight shudder, 'but I shall never, never forget the past."

The highwaymen had not much appetite for the meal which had been laid before them, and it was more a disinclination to offend their old friend, the landlord, than aught else which induced them to touch it.

When the repast was over, Matthew closed the shutters and lighted a couple of candles, which he placed on the table near the fire.

Then he drew from his pocket a crumpled piece of paper, which he smoothed out with great care.

"What is that?" asked Dick.

"The Gazette—the newspaper which contains all the latest intelligence."

"And is there anything in it about us?"

"There is about you, Dick. The reward for your apprehension has been doubled, so that now it represents a tolerable amount."

"Lend it me," said Tom King—"I will look over it."

"Do; it will serve to pass the time away. I will go down again, for any long absence on my part might be noticed, and so give rise to suspicion."

"Try to keep our presence here a secret."

"You may depend upon it."

"It will not be very easy," remarked Tom King to his companion just as the landlord closed the door of the room behind him.

"What makes you say that?"

"Simply what I have been reading."

"Let me hear it," said Dick, with languid interest.

"Well, what Matthew says about doubling the reward is perfectly correct, so that that will stimulate our foes not a little. I was not referring to that, however."

"What then?"

"You will be able to judge best by hearing me read it Just listen."

Tom King then read aloud the following paragraph:—

"'Our readers will see in another column that the reward offered for the apprehension of that noted offender, Dick Turpin, has been doubled. We gladly give publicity to the fact, because we believe, when widely known, it will be the means of bringing him to justice. We have good authority, moreover, for stating that there is unusually strong probability of his speedy capture. He has been seen very recently on the Western Road, apparently having London for his destination. The officers are following up his track with a closeness and perseverance which promise eventual success. When the notorious highwayman has been brought to justice it is hoped that passengers will once more be able to make their way safely along the high-roads which have for so long been disgracefully dangerous to all travellers.'

"There, Dick," cried Tom King, when he had finished reading, "what do you think of that?"

"Very little. They will have to be much sharper than they have ever shown themselves, or Old Matthew very careless, for them to be able to hunt us down here."

Tom did not answer.

In fact, he had gone on reading, and apparently what he read was of so interesting a character as to render him oblivious of all else.

Dick at once relapsed into a reverie.

His eyes were fixed upon the fire, but instead of seeing it he perceived only the quaint little churchyard where Maud lay.

An exclamation from Tom King aroused him.

"Here is something still more startling," he said, in an agitated voice.

"About us?"

"About one of us," answered Tom, vainly attempting to conceal his perturbation of spirits.

"Which one?"

"Myself."

"Read, then," said Dick, rousing himself more thoroughly than he had done.

Tom King, in a low and tremulous tone, then read as follows:—

"'Important.—If the son of the late Marquis of Belgarde (the son by the second marriage, which was afterwards decreed invalid), and who mysteriously disappeared after the trial, will apply to Messrs. Flint and Steele, Solicitors, York, he will hear something greatly to his advantage.'"

"Well," said Dick Turpin, with an air of surprise and disappointment, "is that all. In what way can that advertisement concern either of us?"

"Is it possible that you forget——"

"Forget what?"

"I see you have forgotten," remarked Tom King, with increasing melancholy. "But do you not remember that a long time ago I related to you the history of my early life?"

"Yes, I remember it perfectly."

"Well, then——"

"Belgarde—Belgarde: the name is familiar."

"After what has happened I am not surprised that you should forget. Besides, it is a long time ago since I made the narration."

"My memory fails me."

"No wonder. Well, I will tell you again. My father was the Marquis of Belgarde. He died before I was two years old, and I was brought up on one of the estates, where I remained until nearly of age—of course, anticipating that I should be the marquis. Instead of that," he added, in a changed voice, and with a bitter laugh, "I have become a highwayman."

"I remember now," said Dick; "there was a former marriage—on your father's part—a discarded wife—whose son was by law declared the true heir to the title and estates."

"Just so. It is a tale of sin and wrong. As you know, when I found out what the verdict was, I fled, for my pride would not allow me to remain there a finger-pointing object for everyone."

"Then it is you who are advertised for?"

"Undoubtedly."

"What can it be that is to your advantage?"

"There I am as much in the dark as you are. But I cannot describe the effect which those few lines have had upon me, and how vividly they have brought back to my recollection my youthful days."

Just as he uttered these words, Old Matthew appeared.

"Is all well?" Dick asked, for he guessed this visit had some cause.

"Yes, all is well," was the reassuring answer. "I merely came up for a moment to see whether you were in want of anything."

"Do you often read the newspaper, Matthew?" asked Tom King.

"Yes, pretty regularly," he answered, in some surprise. "Why do you ask?"

"Why, because I thought you might perhaps have seen some mention made of—of—the Marquis of Belgarde?"

"Well, yes, I have," he replied, curiously. "But why do you inquire?"

"Perhaps merely from curiosity," said Tom King, displaying great impatience. "At any rate, I shall feel myself indebted if you will tell me all you know."

"I will do so willingly; but you will find it very little. I suppose you know that the marquis has just died?"

"Just died?" ejaculated Tom.

"Yes—and at the time of his death I saw a few particulars in the paper concerning him."

"Was it respecting the manner in which he succeeded to the title?"

"Yes."

"I thought so."

"It seems his mother lived the greater part of her life in great poverty in London, and here the marquis was brought up like any ordinary vagabond."

"I know that," said Tom, hastily. "The woman was really married, though the marquis, his father, thought the ceremony a sham one. This was proved by his marrying again."

"Yes," chimed in Matthew, "and he had a son by this second union, who was brought up as the heir; but when the trial was decided against him he disappeared."

Tom nodded.

"It seems that the son by the first wife, and who lived but a very short time to enjoy his wealth and title, always regretted that he had deprived another of so much, so that, you see, despite his bringing up, he was not quite dead to every good feeling."

Tom's lips curled with a bitter, incredulous smile.

"He was in earnest," continued Old Matthew, for, having no near relative of his own, he has bequeathed by will the whole of his possessions to this second son, who has been searched for with the utmost diligence."

"He has not been found?" said Tom.

"No—you may see the advertisement in that very paper."

"I have seen it."

"Well, now that I have told you all I know, at least satisfy me why you feel so uncommon an amount of interest in the matter?"

"I——"

But Tom did not finish, for at this moment the faint tinkling of a bell was heard.

"I am wanted," interrupted Matthew, hurrying to the door

"Is it danger?" asked both highwaymen, springing to their feet.

"No, no—don't be alarmed. Sit down again, and remain easy and quiet. You shall have timely warning if you are threatened with any peril."

So saying, Matthew closed the door and hastily descended the stairs.

CHAPTER MLXXXIX.

OLD MATTHEW GIVES THE HIGHWAYMEN THE BENEFIT OF HIS ADVICE.

"He will not deceive or mislead us," said Dick, sinking down into his chair again. "I am amazed," he continued, "at what I have just heard."

"Are you?" asked Tom, with another bitter laugh.

"Yes, because you are the person advertised for, and of course the heir to a large fortune."

"And what good would it do me?" inquired Tom, moodily. "I dare not step forward to claim it; if I did, I should have to answer for my life."

"I suppose that is the case. Hark! here comes Old Matthew."

The landlord now returned.

"It is all right," he said; "I was misled by hearing another bell. All is well; and I thought such being the case, the best thing I could do was to make haste back and say so."

"Many thanks."

Old Matthew evidently meant to stay, for he sat down before the fire, and said:

"Now, Tom King, it is not often I speak in such a way, but let me tell you that I do not intend to stir from here until you have told me all about this Belgarde affair. You had some particular reason for asking, and I think I am justified in demanding to know."

There could scarcely have been any request to which Tom would have accorded so unwillingly as this.

But he felt that he could not with very good grace refuse anything to one who had done them such service as Matthew had.

This consideration decided him, and, though very reluctantly, he related those particulars of his early life with which the reader is familiar.

Matthew listened in unqualified amazement—indeed, almost in disbelief.

But he soon found that Tom was thoroughly in earnest.

"This is enough to stun anyone!" he exclaimed, as soon as Tom had brought his narrative to a conclusion. "But I must think upon it—I must really think upon it, for I am already impressed with the notion that the occurrence can, and ought to be, turned to the advantage of you both."

Tom shook his head.

Old Matthew, however, did not allow this gesture to discourage him, but sat staring into the fire with the air and manner of one who is thinking deeply.

He remained thus for some time, but at length he broke out, emphatically:

"You must both of you—or, at least, you, Tom—go to York."

"To York! What for?"

"To see these lawyers."

"And be recognised and made prisoner!"

"No, no—you must manage better than that."

"But how is it possible for me to do so?"

"That we must consider. First of all you must not overlook the circumstance that in this land of freedom money is all-powerful, and the possessor of enough of it can do anything he pleases."

"Well, granting that, what of it?"

"Why, the heir to the estates of the late Marquis of Belgarde would be looked upon as a very different person from Tom King, the highwayman."

"Come, Matthew," said Turpin, joining in the conversation, "it is an odd thing to me if you cannot see some means of turning this coincidence in our favour."

The landlord's eyes glittered.

"Well," he said, with an affectation of modesty, "I certainly had an idea in my mind."

"Then out with it! Let us hear what it is. I will be bound it is something good!"

"That depends upon how Tom takes it," said Matthew, with a side glance at Dick's companion.

"I cannot tell till I hear what you have to say," said Tom King.

"In the first place, then," Matthew began, "I suppose you have the means of proving your identity?"

"Oh yes!"

"About you?"

"No—but I could easily procure the necessary evidence."

"Very good—that comes to just the same thing."

"What do you propose?"

"Why, I think you should go to York."

"To York?"

"Yes—that is a part of the country you have not visited, I think?"

"We have not."

"Then you might count upon being unknown if you can only get away from here unseen, and I think I can undertake to manage that part of the business for you."

"And what are we to do at York?"

"Why, you must put yourselves into communication with these lawyers."

Tom shook his head.

"Stay—hear me out!" cried Matthew, rapidly. "You must manage all with caution. Let them know who you are, and, take my word for it, they will interest themselves and obtain a pardon for you; and, remember, you will be able to pay them well out of the property you are coming into."

"A pardon!" repeated Tom, with the air of one who is thinking deeply.

"Yes—a pardon."

Tom shook his head.

"I fear I have done too much for a pardon to be granted to me."

"Tut, tut! Don't I tell you that money will do everything in England. If you were ten times as black as you are it would wash you as white as snow!"

"Do you in good earnest think there is a possibility of such a thing?" asked Dick, anxiously.

"If I did not," asked Matthew, "do you think I should counsel you to do it?"

"Well, of course not."

"But," said Tom, "enter a little more into explanation."

"I should be very glad to do so if you would only allow me the opportunity."

"We will listen, then."

"Very good; and you may take my word that I believe things could be managed as I say. If influence powerful enough was only brought to bear, your pardon could be obtained."

Although Tom tried to conceal his sentiments, yet it was plain enough to be seen by his manner that this prospect was far from displeasing to him.

"To tell you the truth," he exclaimed, for he guessed that his friends had read his thoughts, "I am tired now of the life I have been leading after what has happened to Claude and Jack—I feel that I can never take the least pleasure in it again."

"I don't wonder at it."

"Moreover," said Tom, displaying more excitement and interest than he had done hitherto, "if I succeed in getting my own pardon, I shall then have so much influence perhaps as will enable me to get a pardon for the captain too."

Dick put up his hand.

"You will not have to take that trouble, Tom."

"Why not?"

"Because I have made up my mind to take the very first opportunity I can find to leave England."

"Leave England?" ejaculated Old Matthew, pushing his chair back several inches in his intense astonishment.

"Yes; this land has no longer the slightest charm for me—not the slightest. I—I—long to be on the other side of the channel—near to the little hamlet or village I spoke of. There, and there alone, could I wish to end my days and if I can succeed in reaching that spot I shall be beyond the reach of pardon."

"Very true," said Tom.

"But you won't do it," cried Matthew, vehemently—"I am sure you won't do it."

"If I live I shall," answered Turpin, in those quiet, earnest tones which are so much more expressive of stern determination than loud and boastful protestations.

"Well, we shall have to see about that," replied Matthew, resolved that if he could do nothing else he would at any rate change the subject. "Let us first talk about this journey to York. Are you inclined to undertake it?"

"What do you say, captain?" asked Tom King.

"I am quite willing. All ways are the same to me now. Except," he added, "that it may be I shall be able to get a boat from the vicinity of York much easier than I could from any other part of the country, for there I should rely upon being thoroughly unknown."

"And no doubt justly so," said Matthew. "May we look upon this matter, then, as being quite settled?"

"Yes," said Tom, with a sigh, "I suppose we may."

"Then why that sigh?"

"I know not. I was only thinking of——"

"Thinking of what?"

"Some foolish remarks," was the reply. "They are not worth consideration."

But Old Matthew evidently thought himself entitled to know everything connected with the highwaymen, and became so pressing that, in order to get rid of his importunities more than for any other reason, Tom related to him the particulars of the strange prophecy.

Matthew greeted the recital with a laugh.

"I only hope we may all live to see that day. If we do we shall have nothing to complain of on the score of old age. Nothing could be more unlikely to come to pass than that."

It was clear, however, that a certain impression had been made by it on the mind of Tom King—perhaps more than there would have been had he just then been in his usual state of health.

Dick, too, had heard the story so often repeated that a vague feeling that there might be something in it came over him.

The subject was immediately changed by Matthew, who was full of the project he had started for a journey to York.

"If you would take my advice," he said, "you will consent to remain here as long as possible; or, at any rate, until you are sufficiently recovered to start upon your journey."

"The counsel is too agreeable to be disregarded," said Turpin. "I confess I should like to feel that I had recovered something like a proper share of my strength before I attempted any fresh undertaking."

Thus was the matter decided.

A day passed over in perfect tranquillity; but Dick, in watching his companion, saw that hour by hour he grew more and more uneasy, nor was he at any loss about the cause.

The prospect Matthew had held out to him—not only of obtaining a pardon for all his past offences, but also of recovering possession of what had once been his—continued to make a deeper and deeper impression upon him.

Who could wonder that such a future should display itself to him in the most tempting of colours?

The more he reflected the more glowing did his anticipations become, and that which at first he was inclined to pass over without notice came to be the one great object of his life.

His impatience at length became too great to be altogether concealed.

He did not say so, but yet he hinted in many ways that he was tired of his stay, and full of anxiety to know whether Matthew's ideas had any substantiality.

As for Dick, the monotony of confinement in those rooms at the top of Old Matthew's house quickly became excessively irksome to him.

It was, then, on the third night after their arrival that they announced to Old Matthew that they were in readiness to go.

"I had certainly not expected you would take so nasty

[DICK TURPIN TREATS BLACK BESS TO A BEEFSTEAK.]

a departure; otherwise I would not have mentioned the matter just at present. Let me persuade you to stay a little longer yet—you are scarcely in condition to cope with any great danger, should any arise."

"I shall get no better here," said Tom King, impatiently. "What other reason is there why we should not go at once?"

"None that I know of."

"Then we will go."

"But at least not to-night—it is already too late to think about it, because no preparations whatever have been made."

"Well, let it be to-morrow night, then," said Dick Turpin.

"As you please. I will see that by dusk everything is in perfect readiness."

No. 237.—BLACK BESS.

This point being decided upon, some hours were spent in anxious deliberation.

Tom King and Turpin, between them, were possessed of a considerable amount, and this they were both anxious to induce Matthew to accept. But he firmly refused it.

"No—no," he said; "you cannot tell what want you may have for it. Keep it—keep it; I will settle for all the past, Tom, as soon as you are pardoned and in undisturbed possession of your wealth."

But Dick insisted that half of the larger sum should be given to Matthew there and then.

He would take no refusal.

The remaining half he roughly, but as near as could be equally, divided between his comrade and himself.

This being done, they separated and awaited with the utmost impatience the coming of the succeeding night which they hoped would prove to be the herald of better times for both.

Hopes how vain!—how impossible of realisation!

CHAPTER MXC.

THE PROPHECY FULFILLED—DICK TURPIN SHOOTS TOM KING IN DRURY LANE.

It has been said truly that we believe readily that which we wish to be true and likely to come to pass.

But for this it is questionable whether Tom King would have suffered himself to be so led away by the possibilities which Old Matthew had suggested.

To one capable of judging calmly and justly, and one acquainted with all the circumstances, nothing would have appeared more unlikely than that by any means or influence, however powerful, Tom King could hope for legal pardon for his many and great offences.

But for his own part he did think it probable, and so did Turpin, whose thoughts, however, it must be confessed, were more bent upon making his way as speedily as possible to the little French village, where Maud had found a last resting-place.

At any rate, he was glad enough to quit the safe shelter which Old Matthew's roof had afforded him.

During the long period of the sojourn of the highwaymen, however, nothing particular had been seen of the police.

They had been unusually quiet and undemonstrative.

This could only be accounted for by the supposition that they were away on the wrong scent, or else that they were concerting such measures as would tend to the annihilation of the two knights of the road.

Both suppositions were in a measure right, as will be shortly seen.

For the present, however, we must confine ourselves to a description of the proceedings of Dick Turpin and Tom King.

Faithful to his promise, Old Matthew had made every preparation, and having watched his opportunity, he succeeded in getting both our friends into the little private parlour.

"Fortune favours you," he said, briskly, rubbing his hands together—"you ought to account yourselves specially lucky. I believe I may say, with truth, there are no officers about."

"Then," said Tom King, "if that is the case, the sooner we are off the better."

"Certainly; and yet there is no need to be precipitate. Believe me, I am not very anxious to get rid of you."

"Where are the horses?" asked Dick.

"In the stable."

"Are they all right?"

"Right as trivets, Bess especially. I think I never saw her in such good trim and spirits. She seems fit for anything."

At these words Dick experienced a faint revisitation of the old joy which the remembrance of his gallant mare occasioned him.

"I long to see the noble creature once more!" he exclaimed, with fervour. "I long to sit again upon her back! When I do—then, and not till then, shall I feel something like myself again."

But though Turpin began to speak enthusiastically he finished with a heavy sigh, which told all too plainly how great was the sorrow that was weighing at his heart.

"Still a cup too low, captain?" said Old Matthew. "But I will try to get you the better of that."

Dick shook his head.

"You may never expect to see me anything like what I once was."

"Pho—pho! You know nothing about it," replied the landlord, who was busily at work with a corkscrew. "Look here" he added, holding a bottle towards the highwaymen "try a drop of this: it is wine, mind you—every drop of it is worth a hogshead of the stuff that is ordinarily sold under that name. Drink this, and then all the vapours now hanging about your heart and brain will banish! Drink it, I say, and then depart."

While speaking, Old Matthew poured out three large glasses of the wine.

The invitation was one which Dick and Tom King were not very likely to refuse.

"A toast!" said Matthew, as he raised his glass. "Here is hoping I shall not see you again until you are in possession of your own, and when you have obtained not only your own pardon but the captain's too!"

"I hope so too!" said Tom, in response. "But now, Matthew, you will excuse my impatience. Let us say no more—let us not lose a moment more of valuable time. Get our horses ready, and we will start at once."

"As you will," answered the landlord, putting down his empty glass. "I am sorry to part with you; but yet I cannot ask you to remain, for I feel assured there can never be a more favourable opportunity for getting off unseen."

"Where are the horses?"

"In the stable at present."

"Right—you told me so. But how are we to mount?"

"I will tell you. I have thought the matter over, and my belief is that the best way will be to have them brought round to the front."

"What, into Drury Lane?"

"Yes—and the moment they arrive you must sally out, mount with all speed, and ride off."

"But why this course?"

"Because it seems to me to be the one that will give you the best chance against your enemies."

"How so?"

"If anyone is on the watch—and there might be a spy at hand—you will be off and away before he has time to raise an alarm."

"Very true, Matthew. It shall be as you have planned it; only let us go now at once."

"Your weapons are all in perfect readiness for instant use?"

"Trust us for that."

"Then in two minutes the horses shall be in the front."

Matthew quitted the bar-parlour as he spoke.

But he did not latch the door, and Tom, prompted by restlessness and curiosity, took advantage of the circumstance to peep out into the bar beyond.

Judging by his manner, he saw something interesting, for he at once beckoned Dick to his side.

The latter then peeped through the crevice, and his regards were instantly fixed upon a man who was in the act of drinking something at the counter.

Although a great part of the countenance of this individual was concealed by a large bandage, which was placed in a diagonal direction over the left eye, yet Dick was immediately conscious that he had seen this man somewhere before.

But in what place, and when, he in vain tasked his memory to remember.

There was nothing in his manner at all provocative of suspicion. He drank from his glass calmly enough, and seemed to stare around him only with the listless gaze of one who wanted better occupation.

The highwaymen were still watching when they observed Old Matthew approaching, and then of course they withdrew.

"Is all well still?" was the first question.

"I think so."

"Who is that fellow at the bar?"

"What, you have seen him?"

"Yes—who is he?"

"I wish I knew. I am impressed with the idea that I have seen him before at some time or other, and looking very different to what he does now."

"That is just my impression," said Dick Turpin.

"I should set him down for a spy," said Tom. "That was my thought when first I caught sight of him."

"Wait a moment," said Matthew. "I shall know more about him directly, for I intend to have a good look at his features, and without his being any the wiser for it."

These words roused the attention of the two friends.

There seemed to be no end to Old Matthew's contrivances, and he made use of a fresh one on the present occasion.

Stopping nimbly on a chair, he removed a small picture which was hanging against the wall.

A small round hole then became visible, and to this he applied his eye.

This peep-hole was so skilfully placed that it enabled anyone to take a full view of the bar and the passage beyond.

Matthew remained motionless for what seemed to be an intolerable long time to those who were watching him.

At last he descended, and, in answer to the inquiring glances which were bent upon him, he said:

"I think I know him now, although he has disguised himself so well."

"Disguised himself! Who is it?"

"One who has had rather rough treatment here," answered Matthew, complacently, "though it seems he has not yet had enough."

"Who is it?"

"A spy—that's who it is!"

"A spy?" repeated both the highwaymen, at once handling their weapons.

"Yes. I scalded him once terribly with some warm water. But I only wish it had been just a trifle hotter!"

"That is the rascal, is it?"

"It is."

"Is he there still?"

"He was when I stepped down."

Dick nimbly mounted the chair, and there sure enough stood the man, apparently having not the least intention of moving—at any rate, not for some time to come.

Now that Old Matthew had declared his identity, Dick had no trouble at all in recognising him.

"What is to be done?" he said, as he descended. "It will not do for us to attempt to pass him."

"No, no—certainly not; and perhaps, after all, he is quite as well where he is as he would be if he were outside."

"What do you intend to do? If the horses are in the lane how are we to reach them?"

"They are sure to be there by now. But you seem to have forgotten my private way. Look here."

So saying, Matthew opened the secret door by which, as the reader will remember, communication could be had with the yard.

In less than a moment all three were standing in the open air.

Matthew without delay unfastened the door leading into White Horse Yard.

With his hand upon the lock, he said, in a subdued voice, for he was not without the dread that there might be listeners near:

"Farewell, and good luck to you both! I hope you will have every success. When I open the door make a rush into Drury Lane, mount your horses, and be off. You cannot possibly be too speedy in your movements."

"Good-bye, Matthew!" said Tom. "If I do succeed, rest assured that you will not be forgotten."

"I know all about that. Be off with you, and above all, be quick!"

"Open the door, then."

The command was instantly obeyed, and the highwaymen at once glided out into the darkness.

Although they moved rapidly towards the end of the passage, yet their steps were very stealthy and cautious.

At the end of it, and before venturing to dash into the road, they paused.

The first thing they caught sight of was a man holding the two horses.

It would seem that he had been keeping a sharp lookout for them, for he came hastily towards them.

All seemed silent and suggestive of safety.

"Now for it, Tom!" said Dick. "One rush, and be into the saddle as quickly as you can."

"Never fear for that."

"Now, then!"

The highwaymen made a sudden dash forward.

"Off, and away!" said the man, in a low voice. "I am greatly deceived if the grabs are not about in good force to-night! Off, and away!"

Before he had finished speaking the sharp, clear tones of a whistle broke the silence.

Had it been the summons of a magician it could not have produced a speedier effect.

As if by enchantment the a moment before quiet street became alive with police officers.

Dick found himself roughly seized; but he quickly threw off the grasp, and with that sudden bound which he had so often practised, and which had so many times stood him in such good stead, he placed himself in the saddle.

But, rapid as he had been in his movements, yet there had been time enough for two of his foes to be busy with the bridle of his mare.

Like a flash of light Dick's sword leaped from its scabbard, and, quick as the eye could wink, the two men released their hold, and drew back with cries of pain, for they had been so severely wounded about the wrists as to deprive them of all use of their hands.

Obeying the rein, Black Bess gave a sudden bound which carried herself and rider out of the immediate reach of their foes.

Fortunate indeed was it that this sudden movement was made, for quite a shower of bullets flew over the spot they had so recently occupied.

For Dick the way of escape lay open, provided he had chosen to avail himself of immediate flight.

But this was just what he was determined not to do.

He resolved to look to his old comrade, who had not been so successful as himself.

Tom King was not quite so expert at mounting rapidly as Dick was.

However, despite the attack made upon him by his foes, he succeeded in getting one of his feet in the stirrup.

But, unluckily, his horse at this moment swerved aside.

Then the chance was lost.

The officer who had been at first repulsed, sprang again upon him and grasped him tightly by the throat.

Self-defence then compelled Tom King to abandon his attempt to mount his steed while he struggled with his foe.

But he found that his antagonist, though inferior to him in point of height, possessed a remarkably muscular frame, and before many seconds had elapsed our old friend felt that for once he was opposed to one whose strength was greater than his own.

That this should be the case will seem in no measure astonishing when it is remembered that Tom was much enfeebled by his wounds, from which he was very far from having recovered.

But he felt that his life depended upon his exertions, and he struggled tremendously.

The officer's tactics were apparent enough.

His intention was to hurl Tom King to the earth and then fling himself upon him.

"Hold off!" he cried to his associates. "Keep where you are; I can manage the job single-handed easily enough. Leave me, I say, and look after the other one."

There was very near an end to his boasting at this moment, for Tom King, fully realising the desperate nature of his position, summoned up all his energies in order to free himself from the firm grip of his adversary.

The attempt almost succeeded, but not quite.

His temporary success was, in fact, merely owing to the circumstance that he found the officer slightly off his guard.

The struggle now was terrific.

It was just at this juncture that Black Bess gave that extraordinary bound which placed Dick Turpin in temporary safety, and enabled him to look round and see how things fared with his friend.

Before he had time to think what he should do—before, even, he could finish drawing a fresh pistol—which was the first thing instinct prompted him to do—the officer succeeded in flinging Tom King to the earth.

But the highwayman did not cease his struggles.

At first he was undermost, but by a dexterous movement he changed positions with his foe.

Happening then to look up, he saw Dick, some paces off, holding a pistol in his hand.

"Fire, captain," he cried—"fire! Shoot the fellow! It is my only chance, for I am almost overpowered.'

Dick raised his arm and levelled his pistol.

But so rapid were the gyrations of the two combatants that it was impossible to take such an aim at the one as would secure him from wounding the other.

But Tom King was getting exhausted.

"Fire, Dick!" he exclaimad, at the top of his voice. "Why don't you fire? Do you want to see me made prisoner before your eyes?"

"I cannot aim. I am afraid of hitting you!"

"No matter!" cried Tom, impetuously. "Better that than be dragged to Tyburn! Fire—fire, I say! It is the first favour I have begged of you! Fire, I say! Now—now, or you will be too late!"

As he spoke, Tom King made the most strenuous efforts to keep his adversary in one position, while at the same time he held back as much as possible.

Dick fancied he saw his chance, and took a rapid aim.

But the officer was by no means insensible to the danger by which he was menaced.

He caught one glimpse of the glittering barrel of Dick Turpin's pistol.

The sight seemed to gift him with double strength.

A sudden wrench enabled him to shift his position, and it was at this moment that the report of a pistol was heard.

Dick's finger was on the trigger when the officer moved; but he was not in time either to alter the position of the barrel or to stop the pressure.

There was a loud, wild cry, and when the smoke cleared away from before Dick's eyes he saw Tom King lying upon the ground bathed in blood.

The frightful spectacle almost maddened him, and with an awful curse he flung the discharged weapon from him.

By a sudden but painful effort, Tom partially raised himself from the ground.

"The prophecy is fulfilled!" he cried. "Dick, I die by the hand of my best friend! Farewell! Fly—fly—fly at once! Do not linger now, for I am past all mortal aid! Keep my secret! I—I——"

A gush of blood interrupted his speech, and with a gurgling groan he sank back on to the hard roadway—dead!

CHAPTER MXCI.

TOM KING, THE HIGHWAYMAN, FINDS HIS LAST RESTING-PLACE.

LIKE some statue of horror or despair, Dick sat upon his steed gazing with a stupified air at what had just occurred.

So great was the shock that it was clear that at present he was in doubt whether what he saw was real.

But he was aroused by the vigorous efforts of the officers, who, quickly recovering from the state of astonishment into which this occurrence had thrown even them, rushed upon him, intent either upon his death or capture.

The well-known accent of Old Matthew's voice also fell upon his ear.

"Fly—fly!" he heard the landlord exclaim. "Make the best speed you can. To linger here can do no good, for Tom is now beyond all mortal power. You are not to blame. It was fate. Fly—fly!"

Thus urged, Dick half mechanically changed the direction of his mare's head.

No sooner had he done so than Black Bess bounded off at a speed that made thousands of sparks fly from the rugged stones with which Drury Lane was paved.

His brain was on fire. Liquid lead seemed coursing through his veins, while his heart seemed to stand still in his breast, and to have become congealed into a mass of solid ice.

In such a state of frenzy as he then was, no one can be surprised that he should urge his mare to redoubled speed, thinking, perhaps, by that means he should be able to outdistance thought—or rather the agonising recollection of what had just occurred.

But before we follow him in his headlong flight—that flight which was destined more than anything else to perpetuate the remembrance of himself and steed—we will devote a few words to what took place at the inn, in order that, having done so, we may follow him throughout his long and eventful ride without being under the necessity of making any interruption.

In the first place, then, we may state that Old Matthew spoke no more than the truth when he said that Tom King was already beyond all human aid.

The bullet from the pistol of his best friend had done its work effectually.

So narrow, though, was the escape of the police officer, that the bullet, in its course, cut off the lower part of his ear, and made a rather deep, ugly-looking furrow along one cheek before it finally found a lodgment in the heart of the highwayman. Old Matthew had been a spectator of the whole of the disastrous affair, which, although we have been some time in describing it, because we have mentioned every detail, yet seemed to him no more than a momentary scuffle.

Even had he felt the inclination to take any share in the affray, he would not have had the opportunity, for before he could possibly re-collect his faculties, Tom King was lying on the ground.

The officer struggled to his feet, scarcely knowing whether he was alive or dead.

Blood poured copiously from his hideous-looking wound, and ere long the frightful smarting which it set up brought him to himself.

The first thing Old Matthew did was to bound forward and stoop down over the prostrate form of the highwayman.

He placed his hand just above the region of the heart.

It was covered with blood in an instant.

But there was not the feeblest pulsation, and a glance at the features showed that they bore the unmistakable impress of Death.

It was then that Old Matthew addressed those words to Dick which we have already recorded.

Then, having spoken, he turned his attention once more to the prostrate form.

The reader will scarcely require to be told how deep and sincere was Old Matthew's grief, for, from the first, Tom had ever been one of his especial favourites.

The wounded officer feeling no inclination to join in the pursuit which had just been set on foot after Dick Turpin, came forward a step or two, and addressing the landlord, said:

"There's one more of your pets done for, my friend; and the one that remains won't hold his life and liberty many hours longer. The precautions taken are such as will make escape totally impossible."

"And you will carry a mark that will remind you of to-night whenever you happen to look in a glass," returned Matthew, who, after one glance at the officer's bleeding physiognomy, turned shudderingly away.

The officer solaced himself by giving vent to some horrible curses.

Then he added:

"I can put up with it, and could put up with a great deal more. I captured him single-handed—I knew I could do it if I only had a fair trial, and so you see I shall have no one to divide the reward, and therefore I shall be quite content."

"People's ideas about contentment widely differ," remarked Old Matthew. Then, in an altered tone, he said:

"What is to be done with this poor fellow?"

"Done with him?" repeated the officer, for he was not prepared with an immediate answer.

"Yes; what is to be done?"

"D—d if I know!"

"Let him be carried indoors," suggested Old Matthew, "otherwise there will be such a crowd about our ears as will prevent us from doing anything."

"I don't know what to do," observed the officer, still busy in his attempts to check the flow of blood from his wound. "But he's dead, and therefore there is nothing to fear about his escaping, so we will carry him in."

Old Matthew beckoned the ostler to come to his assistance, and between them the body of poor Tom King was carried into that room where he had stood only a few minutes before indulging in such bright hopes about the future.

Matthew had much ado to conceal his emotion, nor could he have been able to do so but for the thought that the manifestation of any particular sorrow upon his part might be the means of getting him into much future trouble.

The officer bawled lustily for a surgeon to dress his wound.

"I'll send my report to head-quarters, and sit down here till I hear further," he said, in tones of dogged determination; "and if I stir, blow me! Ten thousand devils! where is the surgeon?"

The pain in his cheek now every moment increased in severity, and it had already reached such a pitch as to be almost unendurable.

Matthew occupied himself in covering Tom over with a sheet; and having thus done for him all that lay in his power, he withdrew to give full vent to his grief.

"Who would have dreamed it?" he said, wringing his hands. "It seems now to be hardly possible. Dead—and at such a moment! To fall by Dick's hand, too—that is strangest of all—and to think that he should dread the occurrence of some such event! What will be Dick's feelings now? He declared himself tired of life before—how will he be after this?"

Such was the nature of the landlord's reflections.

As for the officer, true to his purpose, he remained beside the dead highwayman.

His wound was dressed, and by the time this operation was completed other police officers arrived.

After much discussion it was finally determined that Tom's body should remain where it was until after the inquest, when a further resolution could be made.

This course was carried out, the body all the time being under the guard of a troop of officers.

The official inquiry as to the cause of death was duly made, and the various facts deposed to.

The verdict was one of wilful murder against Dick Turpin, for whom, on this account, though it seems strange to say it, an additional reward was offered.

In this way the affair ended.

With a dead body—though it was that of a daring offender—the law could do nothing.

An effort was indeed made to have it buried within the precincts of Newgate, but Old Matthew got some persons to come forward to claim the body as that of a relative, and of course it was handed to them.

The melancholy duty of finding a last resting-place for the senseless clay then remained, and Old Matthew performed it in a manner which he felt certain would be approved of by Dick himself.

Most anxiously, then, he waited to hear intelligence of the captain, of whom since the moment of his departure he had heard no tidings.

It now becomes our duty to follow Dick, yet first of all we must mention one of Mr. Skellum's manœuvres.

It was one which did credit to his ingenuity, and it must be confessed that had it been put into execution earlier, the career of the highwaymen must have been brought to a full stop.

The plan was simply this:—

On every high-road leading from London he made arrangements at the various posting-houses that horses to the number of at least half a dozen should be kept in constant readiness for him.

The reason of this is obvious.

He trusted that the time was not far off when one or other of the highwaymen would be started from their place of concealment.

When this was done, the officers who were first upon his track were to ride him down, which the continual relays of fresh horses procured without an instant's delay, would doubtless enable them to do.

At all risks, they were not to lose sight of their prey after having once started it.

His instructions were that they should not exhaust themselves in endeavouring to overtake and make a capture, but solely be directed to keeping steadily upon the track.

How these instructions were carried out, and what was the effect of them, will now be very shortly seen.

Certainly, however, these energetic measures seemed to promise ultimate success to Mr. Skellum and his party.

CHAPTER MXCII.

OLD MATTHEW STANDS A FRIEND TO POOR TOM KING FOR THE LAST TIME.

Dick Turpin's sensation of agony increased a thousandfold as he rode at that mad gallop along Drury Lane.

Although, strictly speaking, he was not to blame for what had occurred, he, nevertheless, blamed himself bitterly, and suffered the liveliest sensations of remorse and horror.

His state of mind, however, is so far beyond our powers of discription that we shall pass it over almost in silence.

We can only say that it was in a state closely bordering upon frenzy that he continued to urge his mare onward in a northerly direction.

Where he was going he never troubled himself to think, though that he should take this course, as one may say, almost mechanically, is not to be wondered at when it is remembered that Tom King and himself had agreed to go to York.

At present, however, he had no thought that this should be his destination.

At length the very steep ascent of Stamford Hill was reached, and Black Bess, being left entirely to herself, thought fit to reduce her speed to a walk.

It was this change in the rate of motion that brought Dick Turpin to a sense of where he was.

He looked around him in the utmost surprise for a moment or so.

Then, recognising the locality, he allowed his mare to proceed, while he again overwhelmed himself with vain reproaches.

"To think that it should be this hand that should deprive my old comrade of his life!" he exclaimed, clenching his right fist violently. "To deprive him of it, too, just at the moment when his future began to look bright and worth living for! The prophecy is fulfilled. How strange that it should be so! If I received some intimation of my own fate, I should be far from disregarding it now, however unlikely it might appear.

"And what is to be the end of all?" he asked himself, at length. "I stand alone. One by one my cherished companions have fallen, and I am left alone—alone: no, not alone—that can never be while Black Bess is with me. May I never live to see the day that she is taken from me! If the day ever does come, I shall be desolate indeed."

He patted her neck fondly while he spoke, and Black Bess testified to the pleasure she felt at this recognition on the part of her master.

He little thought how close the time was when this separation would take place, and how soon he would have to experience the intense bitterness of utter desolation.

A moment afterwards, and he paused at the old toll-gate.

"Here's a guinea," said Dick, as he flung the coin named to the tollkeeper. "I always choose to pay in advance. The next time you see me coming, mind you have the gate open."

"All right, your honour," returned the man, placing one finger at the side of his nose and shaking his head in a very knowing manner. "Don't you trouble about that."

Dick rode on very leisurely.

He had no motive for making unusual speed, for he had no idea that he was pursued.

It was easy to see that he was thinking deeply; no doubt he was endeavouring to decide upon some course of future action.

There were many difficulties in the way of this, and before he had at all overcome his perplexity he was aroused by a peculiar sound that Black Bess gave utterance to.

"Hilloa!" he cried. "What does this mean? Steady, old lass—steady—steady! Can you hear anything—eh?"

Black Bess came to a full stop, as though to allow her master the opportunity of listening.

Dick turned half round in the saddle, and placed his hand to his ear.

"Horsemen are coming," he said; "but surely not in pursuit of me. No—no. If so, I should have heard of them long ere this. I will go quietly, and keep a sharp look-out."

It may seem strange that Dick did not seek safety in instant flight; but just then, to tell the truth, he was not in the mood for taking active measures of any kind.

The great incentives to preserve his life and liberty no more existed—life was a thing which he had ceased to prize.

The lapse of a few seconds rendered it beyond doubt that horsemen were coming—not in very large numbers, but at an unusually rapid rate.

"I will make sure whether they are after me or not," he muttered. "I won't take a long ride into the country unnecessarily, I am determined."

So saying, he caused his mare to turn her face towards the direction whence the sounds came, and calmly waited to find out whether his conjectures were well or ill-founded.

He was not allowed to remain very long in his state of incertitude.

Although the night was dark, he presently made out the forms of approaching mounted men, nor did he require them to come very close for him to be certain that they were police officers.

It seemed, however, that it was close enough for them to see him, and consequent upon this discovery they all set up a loud shout.

There were in all about eight well-mounted men, all intent upon the capture of the highwayman.

But the sight of so many armed men close to him, and literally thirsting for his blood, caused him no sensations of dismay.

On the contrary, it would seem as though the mere sight of them did much towards bringing back some of his old boldness of demeanour.

Be this how it may, it is a fact that his manner underwent a great alteration.

In the first place, he took off his hat and, after waving it in an elaborate fashion in the air, made an ironical bow.

Then, raising his voice, he exclaimed:

"If you are inclined for a good long ride along the Old North Road, I shall not for a moment think of baulking your desires. You will excuse me taking the precedence of you, but I allow no one to ride before me unless he has proved himself to be a better man than I am myself. Besides, I shall be able to clear the way of all obstructions, and all you have to do is to follow me just so far as your inclination may lead you."

The reader may perhaps be able to imagine how intensely aggravating these bantering words were to the police officers.

They heard nearly every syllable that fell from Dick's lips—so close, in fact, were they that the foremost of the troop made a trial with his pistol.

But the bullet whistled harmlessly past the highwayman, who, again bowing profoundly, replaced his hat and rode away at a round pace, yet by no means so quickly as to take him out of sight of his enemies.

The police officers were frantic with rage.

"Curse the villain!" cried the one who had fired the pistol. "It is bad enough to put up with the annoyance of failing continually, but to be insulted and braved in this fashion is outrageous. But come on, my boys, the devil himself must have led him on to this road, for, as you know, Mr. Skellum is somewhere on this road. If he falls in with this rascal he'll make him change his tune, I'll warrant!"

"Push on, then," said another voice. "We ought to keep close behind, and by no means lose sight of him; then, should he come up with Mr. Skellum, he will find himself between two fires, d—n him!"

The last two words were spoken with so much emphasis that all the rest laughed loudly.

"There he goes!" said another. "Look—look! He is behind those fir trees now! You will see him again in a moment. Yes—yes, there he is!"

In effect, while the officer thus spoke, Dick Turpin emerged from the protecting shadow of some tall trees that grew by the wayside, and could now be distinctly seen.

The officers finding that his speed was not very extraordinary, became at once flushed with hopes of success, and plied whip and spur most vigorously.

What added most, however, to the anticipation of success was the fact that Mr. Skellum was on the road before them at the head of another troop.

After what he had accomplished all began to show Skellum a great deal of attention, and place great belief in his powers.

"I will tire them out," said Dick, mentally, as he kept Black Bess rather tight in hand. "I should like to know how far they would follow me."

"There's something the matter with his horse," was the impression of the police officers. "Hurrah! we shall have him to-night after all! There must be something the matter that prevents him from going any faster."

This, as the reader knows, was an entirely erroneous idea; but it was quite a feasible thing to the officers, and it formed for them an additional and powerful incentive to make every exertion.

CHAPTER MXCIII.

DICK TURPIN COMMENCES HIS LONG RIDE.

The excitement caused by finding himself thus closely pursued was most agreeable to the feelings of Dick Turpin, for it prevented him from dwelling upon those terrible events which had so weighed him down.

While galloping along the high-road with half a score of well-armed police officers in the rear, all intent upon his destruction, it was hard to turn his thoughts to other matters.

The feeling to Dick was similar to that experienced by anyone who unexpectedly finds an entire relief from bodily pain.

"They will find me in the humour to ride," he said, as he glanced behind him. "I only hope they will not soon tire. They are coming on too fast, however, to be able to keep up the pace."

To the utter astonishment, then, of the police officers Dick continued to keep just such a distance before them as to be out of the range of their pistols; and, strangest of all, no matter how great their efforts, they could not reduce this distance one inch.

Suddenly, however, Dick was warned by Bess that some one was approaching in front, for he was too much occupied to notice the circumstance himself.

It was now a little lighter than it had been, for the moon had reached a point where the clouds were less opaque than elsewhere, and, consequently, a dim light was shed all around.

Turpin looked very attentively in front, and, in less than a moment he made out the forms of five horsemen.

His first thought, of course, was that they must be police officers, but this he found to be an error.

By the careless way in which they rode along, chatting to each other, and occasionally indulging in a laugh that rang out sharply in the clear air, it seemed certain that they were gentlemen devoid of any particular business, and merely riding for amusement.

At the outset Dick had drawn a pistol, but now he returned the weapon to the holster.

In reconnoitring those in advance, he had unwittingly fallen further into the rear than was prudent.

The officers, elate with anticipated triumph, redoubled their efforts.

They caught sight of the approaching horsemen, and set up such a shout as instantly drew their attention to them.

"Stop him!" they bawled, at the top of their lungs—"stop him! A highwayman—a highwayman! Stop him! A hundred pounds reward!"

Owing to the stillness of the night, for there was no sound save that produced by the iron-shod hoofs of the horses, these words were distinctly heard by the gentlemen in front.

For a second they seemed so surprised as to be incapable of action, but recovering themselves quickly, they placed themselves in a line across the roadway, doubtless thinking that the adoption of this course would stay the further progress of the fugitive.

But they knew not the man with whom they had to deal.

"Stand firm!" bawled the officers. "Whatever you do, stand firm! A hundred pounds reward!"

The gentlemen seemed fully inclined to obey this command.

Dick spoke to Black Bess.

It was only one word that he pronounced, accompanied by a slackening of the rein.

But the effect was as immediate as extraordinary.

At one bound she changed the gentle rate at which he had been going to her old tremendous swinging gallop.

The onward rush of the highwayman and his steed can now be compared to nothing but a whirlwind.

"Stand aside!" he cried, in a loud voice, that made itself distinctly heard above everything else. "Stand aside, or your death be on your own heads!"

The furious onward rush of the highwayman dismayed the travellers.

With more alacrity than was compatible with either dignity or courage, they drew to one side and allowed the furious horseman free passage.

There was a bend in the road not very far in advance, and round this Black Bess sped at the same rate, and was then entirely lost to view, though the sharp clatter of her hoofs upon the stony roadway could still be heard.

Upon seeing what we have described take place, the officers gave vent to the most awful imprecations conceivable.

So enraged were they at the pusillanimity of the travellers that they chose rather to pull up their horses and pour out their abuse than continue the pursuit.

"D—n ye for fine curs!" said the first constable, who followed on with some flowers of speech best left unexpressed. "Why couldn't you stand firm and bar his passage? If you had only shown a little firmness, he would have been in our hands by now."

"Do you know who you are talking to, sirrah!" cried one of the travellers.

"Yes," was the angry reply—"a set of d—d white-livered hounds that couldn't stop a single man among you!"

"You shall smart for this conduct!" said another traveller. "Things have come to a fine pass indeed when gentlemen can be abused by a set of d—d scum-of-the-earth police officers! Get out of the way, and let us ride on!"

"Yes, we'll get out of the way, never fear!" was the sneering response. "And the next time you come out you had better bring your wet nurses with you! Come on, lads!" he added — "its no good dilly-dallying here!"

So saying, he rode on, followed swiftly by his companions, all of whom amused themselves by cursing and swearing and saying what might have been done if the travellers had only showed a bold front.

The travellers, meanwhile—who happened to be a party of noblemen—rode towards London, vowing vengeance upon all the police officers in the land.

We will leave both parties to follow Dick Turpin.

When Black Bess bounded off at the tremendous pace we have mentioned, her rider's sensations were those of joy and triumph, succeeded by the consciousness that the headlong rate at which they were now going was even more exciting still.

Away, then, he flew, for he allowed the reins to fall loosely on his courser's back, and let her go at what speed she chose.

What distance along the high-road was travelled in this manner he had no clear idea, but all at once he perceived several twinkling lights.

"That must be Edmonton," he said, to himself. "We have come further than I thought. No matter, I have distanced them now, no doubt, for they would never think of continuing the chase after seeing Bess lay out in the way she did. It would be madness on their part to think of overtaking her. I will just go on as far as the Old Bell, and stop there awhile. There is time yet," he added, with a heavy sigh—"plenty of time for me to decide what I am to do in the future."

By slow degrees he reduced his mare's gallop so as not to enter the village at such a speed as to excite too much attention, and after the lapse of a few moments pulled up in front of the ancient, well-known inn.

Many lights were shining from the various windows, and sounds of high revelry reached his ears, as though some unusual merry-making was going on within.

A moment or two elapsed before the ostler made his appearance, and the delay caused Dick to alter his mind.

"No—no," he muttered. "Be it how it may, I will not stop here. Such mirth and jollity as now take place beneath the old roof would jar too painfully upon me. I will have something now I have stopped, and so shall Bess; but I will not alight—no—no—I will not alight!"

Just as he had arrived at this determination the ostler came forward.

"Humbly beg your pardon, sir, for keeping you here waiting for so long, but, you see, to-night is an uncommon busy one. I'm most run off my legs. What might your honour want?"

"A bucket of water with a pound of oatmeal in it, a whisp of hay, and a glass of the best brandy you have in the house."

"Right, sir. Will you step inside?"

"No, I will stay here—be quick."

"Depend upon me, your honour."

The ostler vanished, and Dick looked attentively at his mare.

Few persons would have suspected that she had travelled so far, and part of the time so rapidly.

Not a hair was turned.

All over her coat was as glossy and sleek as velvet, and her respiration scarcely, if at all, accelerated.

The nostrils were a little distended, but not sufficiently so as to attract notice.

"Brave Bess," said Dick, patting her fondly, while his heart throbbed and his eyes glistened with joy and pride. "There may have been your equal in the world before, and there may be in time to come, but I doubt both. I have never tried your mettle yet, but you could accomplish a miracle, old lass, I will be bound you could, if you were only put to it. You are the only earthly possession I have left now," he added, in a subdued voice, and with a fresh access of emotion.

Just then the ostler appeared, carrying with him the articles ordered.

The refreshment was truly welcome to both, especially to Dick, who felt like one parched with fever.

The liquor he had called for was not at all calculated to allay his thirst; but he never thought of that, and swallowed the fiery spirit at a draught.

"Put the hay in the rack," he said, "and leave her the bucket. There is no occasion for hurry; and get me another glass."

"Of brandy, sir?"

"Yes, a larger glass than that."

The ostler hurried off, and almost immediately reappeared, carrying a glass in one hand and a bottle in the other.

"This has only just been uncorked," he said, "and you can have just as much as you like."

The glass was a rather large goblet.

Dick filled it to the brim.

"Drink the rest yourself," he cried, giving back the bottle, "and drink to the health of the best steed in England."

As he spoke, he drank deeply of the contents of the glass—so deeply as to make the ostler open his eyes to a most unusual width.

But, for all that, he did not neglect the toast.

Disdaining the luxury of a glass, he placed the neck of the bottle between his lips and allowed the brandy to gurgle down his throat.

"The best steed in England!" he ejaculated, as soon as he had recovered breath after his draught. "And may I make so bold as to ask which that is?"

"This," answered Dick, stroking the beautiful arched neck of Black Bess.

"That?" said the ostler, looking at her with a critical eye. "Well, so far as I can tell, I should think you are not far off the mark."

"I am sure I am not," said Turpin, finishing his huge draught, and speaking with an enthusiasm that might have been in part caused by what he had drunk.

At this moment a loud yelling sound broke the silence.

Dick had so completely given up the idea that he was pursued that he had never listened, and consequently had failed to hear the rattling of horses' hoofs in the distance which had been audible for some moments.

Looking up now, he was astonished to find his pursuers within a few yards of him.

How they had managed to get up with him so quickly passed his comprehension.

They saw him, too. The yelling shout was sufficiently indicative of that fact.

"Those gentlemen seem troubled about something," he said, in a calm voice, as he slowly placed the empty glass in the ostler's outstretched hand. "I wonder what is the matter? However, it is no business of mine. Good night!"

CHAPTER MXCIV.

DICK TURPIN TELLS HIS FOES THAT THEY WILL HEAR OF HIM IN YORK.

THE presence of the police officers at Edmonton at that juncture, although well-nigh incomprehensible to Dick Turpin, was like many other seemingly mysterious events, one of the simplest things in the world.

The reader will remember what has been said about Mr. Skellum's arrangements for relays of horses

Now it so happened that on the North Road, Tottenham was the first place beyond London appointed for that purpose.

Through this village Dick had gone at headlong speed.

The officers, however, burning with resentment and more determined than ever after what had occurred that they would not lose sight of the fugitive, knowing that fresh horses could be had at such a short distance ahead, urged the exhausted beasts they bestrode to make yet greater speed.

Arriving at Tottenham, only the briefest possible delay took place.

It happened also that the steeds which they procured in exchange were of far more than ordinary quality, and consequently by dint of perpetually belabouring the animals with the stocks of their heavy whips, and goring them with their spurs, they succeeded in reaching Edmonton as we have described.

But such was the violence with which they had treated their horses immediately after coming out of the stable that they were now nearly half blown, and exhibited many signs of distress.

"Death and the devil!" said the foremost, furiously, to the wondering ostler. "Why didn't you stop that man? There's a couple of thousand pounds to be had for his head! That is Dick Turpin, the highwayman!"

"Blow me!" ejaculated the ostler, with great emphasis. "Why, I might have known it."

"Of course you might! How is his horse?—is it fresh?"

"A d—d sight fresher nor yourn?"

"Get on," said the officer—"don't spare the horseflesh. We have not to take these many miles. If we keep on his track we must run him down at last; and when he is deprived of his horse he will be at our mercy entirely."

Cheered by this prospect, the officers recommenced their efforts, and in a few moments the Old Bell Inn at Edmonton was left behind.

What encouraged the officers still more was that every now and then the light wind would bring to their ears faint clatter of Bess's hoofs, showing that she could such a very long distance in advance.

Leaving the officers to continue their pursuit, we will again accompany the highwayman.

As might be expected, the fumes of the vast quantity of brandy he had swallowed began to mount up to his brain, which, added to the exhilaration produced by his hard riding, caused a most unusual elation of spirits.

That kind of oblivion of unpleasant recollections which follows partial intoxication wrought its full effect upon him

At first he pondered a little upon the means by which his foes had been enabled to get so close upon his heels; but after a few moments this became too perplexing and tiresome for his faculties to carry out.

"They seem in a mood to chase me," he muttered, as he brought his mare to a walk, for a long and steep hill lay before him. "It is doubling the reward that has done it, I suppose. Well—well, I will give them such a tiring as will make them think twice before they attempt to chase me again."

As Dick would not allow Black Bess to ascend this hill except at a walk, it follows that it took a considerable length of time to reach the summit.

The officers, who had not for a moment ceased to flog their horses, consequently gained upon him.

It was while slowly ascending that the idea of riding to York first occurred to him.

"Bess, old lass," he muttered, half aloud and half to himself, "no one knows the extent of your powers yet. Let me think. My determination—my irrevocable resolution is to quit my occupation of highwayman at once and for ever. Good! But, Bess, old lass, shall we, who have made together so great a reputation in the world—I say, shall we drop out of it thus obscurely?—shall we vanish without a sign, and so suffer our glories to be quite eclipsed? No, no," he added, in an exultant voice, for the brandy now was working its full influence upon him—"no, no! Before we quit this scene we will do that which shall cause us both to be remembered and spoken of throughout all future time. Yes, yes," he cried, with growing excitement, "we will do that which no one has done yet, and which most probably no one will ever attempt to do again. We will ride to York—to York: yes, yes—from London to York! Let me think. That is two hundred miles or thereabouts, and the fastest coach takes four days and nights. Ha, ha!—four days and nights! It is odd to me, Bess, if we do not do it in less than twelve hours. At any rate, we will try. What say you, old lass, shall it be so or not?"

Black Bess responded by that answering neigh which she always gave when her master spoke to her.

"So you are willing, then?" exclaimed the highwayman, "and so am I. It shall be done! At sunset to-morrow we will be at York."

He ratified his determination with an oath.

But the summit of the hill was now reached.

Instead of immediately commencing the descent, however, he came to a complete stop, and turned round so as to face his pursuers who, by dint of the almost superhuman exertions they had incessantly made, were about half way up the hill.

Just at this moment the moon peeped down at what was going forward.

To Dick and his foes, who had been for so long in obscurity, her light seemed absolutely brilliant: they could distinguish all around them with great ease and plainness.

"D—n his impudence!" said the foremost officer. "Why he is standing stock still. Is he going to stop there and let us take him?"

"No fear," growled one of his companions. "You had better look out. I am sure he means mischief."

"Push on—push on! If he will only remain where he is a little longer he will be within range, and then, at all risks, I will take a shot at him."

Dick calmly awaited their approach, and when they had got to what seemed a most dangerous proximity he took off his hat and bowed in the same insulting manner as before.

"Gentlemen all," he said, "I have a few remarks to make to you."

Hearing him speak, the officers mechanically checked their steeds and listened intently.

The tired beasts readily came to a standstill, and over and above their loud panting, they heard Dick say:

DICK TURPIN ASTONISHES THE DRIVER OF THE YORK MAIL-COACH.

No. 288.—Black Bess.

No. 239 will be Published next Monday.

"You seem to me, gentlemen, to be like I am—that is, just in the humour for a long ride. If you like to accompany me upon my journey, well and good; I have no objection—not the least in the world; but it will try your mettle. Gentlemen," he added, in a still louder voice, "if you want me, you will find me to-morrow morning at the old Bowling Green in the city of York; till then, farewell!"

As he pronounced the last words, he again waved his hat.

Then, turning round with surprising swiftness, he let go the rein, and away Black Bess flew down the steep declivity at what seemed to be a breakneck pace.

Just as he started, many bullets whistled about his ears, for the officers had recovered from their first astonishment.

Loud and deep were the curses they breathed upon his audacity; but the object of their anger was unhurt, and was speeding along the high-road at a rate that seemed to set all probability of successful pursuit at defiance.

But the officers had the utmost faith in the arrangements made by Mr. Skellum, for whom, by-the-by, they had been for some long time past on the look-out.

Every moment they had expected him to join them; but now, as they got farther and farther away from London, their hopes began to wane, because of their impression that he would have had no object for riding so far away.

Although the police officers came down the long, steep hill with all the speed their horses were capable of making, and incurring no inconsiderable risk in so doing, yet the reader will not be surprised to hear that when they reached the level road Dick Turpin and Black Bess were out of sight.

The next changing-place was only about eight miles farther on, and so they did not scruple to urge their horses as before.

All at once, however, the attention of all was attracted by a cry given by one of their number.

"Look there," he cried, in a somewhat excited tone of voice, and pointing with his whip across the open country as he spoke—"look there! Do you see who is coming?"

"Who—who?" asked several anxious voices.

"Who?—why, Mr. Skellum, to be sure! Can't you see him? I could tell him a mile off."

"Yes—yes, I do believe it is; and what is more, if that is not Bill Jinks who is riding next to him it is odd to me."

"What is to be done?"

"Why, we will wait here a moment and signal to him. We shall perhaps get in for it if we don't let him know just how matters are at present."

"Of course we shall," assented another voice; "though why he should be over in that direction I cannot imagine."

There was little need to make any signals to Mr. Skellum, since he had already caught sight of the troop of police officers, and was making his way in a direct line towards them.

A few moments elapsed before his arrival.

He was most anxious to learn the news.

As soon as he heard that Dick Turpin had undoubtedly passed by such a short time before, he uttered a howl of rage, and then his vexation waxed so great that he pulled off his three-cornered hat and flung it on the ground with furious violence.

It was immediately trampled into the mud by the hoofs of the horses.

"Fool—ass that I have been!" were the first words he ejaculated; and he seemed more than half inclined to fling his dingy-looking wig down too.

The officers looked on in surprise

"Here have I been riding myself nearly to death, thinking Dick Turpin was before me, and now I am convinced it was some one else. I was told it was Captain Hawk; but I would not believe it."

"Captain Hawk? Have you been in pursuit of him?"

"Didn't I say so?"

"And you have not captured him?"

"No fear. He rides like Dick Turpin himself."

"We shall have no little trouble with him, I expect."

"But you say that Dick Turpin himself is on the road before us, don't you?"

"Unquestionably."

"How do you know?"

"Because he told us that if we wanted him, we should find him to-morrow morning at the Bowling Green at York.'

"At where?" bawled Skellum.

"At York."

"At the devil more likely! but"—and here Mr. Skellum seemed to speak more like himself—"if it is really his intention to ride to York his fate is sealed."

"How so?"

"Because of the relays I have upon the road. If he keeps to the highway, we shall be able, by our frequent changes, to overtake him before he has gone half the distance—say, or a quarter of it."

Mr. Skellum spoke with an immense amount of confidence; but this feeling was by no means strongly shared in by the men, who considered much valuable time had been lost.

But Mr. Skellum very soon set them all in motion again.

CHAPTER MXCV.

BLACK BESS SAVES THE TOLLMAN THE TROUBLE OF OPENING THE TURNPIKE GATE.

Dick Turpin did not attempt to lighten rein until he had placed at least twenty miles between himself and the spot where he had spoken to the officers.

The speed Black Bess had made, and the style in which she had done her work, filled him with enthusiasm.

If possible, he felt more certain than before that she would be able to accomplish the tremendous journey with comparative ease.

Although he was now something like thirty miles from Drury Lane, yet Black Bess did not give signs of having travelled more than three.

Slight as was the restraint he placed upon her with the view of moderating her pace, yet she chafed terribly beneath it, and seemed half inclined for once in the way to assert that she had a will of her own.

"You are full of mettle, my old lass," Dick said, as he patted her neck, "and you are beginning to feel a little excited. But quiet, Bess—quiet, I say!—I don't want you to exert yourself too much at present. You must husband your resources, for you have real need of doing so."

As he pronounced the last words he compelled her to walk; but it was easy to see that so far from being sensible of the least fatigue, Black Bess was just sufficiently heated to be desirous to do more.

To see the way in which she would at times try to change her present snail-like pace to gallop would almost induce the belief that she was conscious of the task that lay before her, and was full of impatience to accomplish it as speedily as possible.

The country, however, was now of a more uneven character than it had been, and Dick continually held her in.

In this way five more miles, or thereabouts, were accomplished, and then he perceived in front of him a small, twinkling light.

Drawing closer, he found that it proceeded from a window in the gable-end of a house, which, by its position, would seem to be a roadside inn.

The supposition turned out correct, and Dick resolved that at all hazards he would let his mare rest there for a short time.

The place seemed silent and deserted, and there was little to fear in the shape of an interruption.

The trampling of hoofs brought forth the ostler, who was, indeed, listening for and expecting an arrival, for this was one of Mr. Skellum's changing places.

Dick alighted, but he would not enter the house, nor would he allow Black Bess to enter the stable.

But he unloosed the saddle girths, and wholly removed the bridle, so as to relieve her mouth.

Then he stood by and saw her carefully rubbed down—Black Bess the while eating a little hay and quenching her thirst with water in which oatmeal had been mixed in a liberal proportion.

As the time went on without any sound indicative of the approach of his foes being borne to his ears, Dick began to think that they had abandoned all idea of pursuit

Whether this was so or not, however, he was determined not to relinquish his design.

There would be plenty of testimony as to the time when he left London, and it would be his own business to arrange that the hour of his arrival in York should be correctly noted.

"My lad," he said to the ostler as he prepared to ride away, "if you are asked, you need not be quite sure whether I am Dick Turpin, but you can say I am going to York."

He threw the lad a crown-piece as he spoke, and rode off, leaving the ostler in a state of considerable surprise and bewilderment.

Dick still went on slowly.

There was no urgent need for speed, and he knew he could not do better than perform the first half of his long journey with as little distress and extra exertion as possible.

Ere he had gone far, however, his quick ears caught the sound of horses' hoofs.

But the clatter died away again almost immediately, leaving him in doubt as to whether his ears had served him rightly.

Not for long, though, was he left in this state of indecision.

The sound broke forth again, and this time with a clearness that was unquestionable.

Dick looked behind him.

But the darkness was too great to enable him to see very far.

"I should like to know whether these are the same officers who are upon my track," he muttered. "If so, I should begin to think they were in earnest, and actually meant to follow me. I will stay and see."

There was no need to alter Bess's present speed, for she was going only at a walk, while those behind were coming at a hard gallop.

It was scarcely likely that they were any but police officers; but Dick chose to be quite certain; besides, it might have been a little bravado on his part.

At length they came in sight.

"They are the police officers," ejaculated Dick; "and it is odd to me if their numbers are not doubled. They have had a reinforcement somewhere—they are certainly in earnest."

A loud cry now made him aware that he was seen.

Mr. Skellum was full of exultation.

"I told you so!" he cried to his followers. "We have only to stick to him now and he is ours. No horse can possibly hold out against the relays I have provided. See how we have gained upon him already! Push on—push on!"

To tell the truth, the officers were no less surprised than encouraged upon finding that they had gained upon the highwayman in the way they had done; but they would not have felt half so ardent had they been in full possession of the exact facts of the case in the same way that the reader is.

On the other hand, had Dick known earlier about the relays kept constantly in readiness, it might have induced him to abandon his design.

As it was, they began to think with their leader, that their efforts at last were to be crowned with success.

Dick, finding there was no room for doubt about the character of his pursuers, rode off, though not so swiftly as he might have done, for he felt perfectly certain he could show them a clean pair of heels whenever he thought fit to do so.

But there was an obstacle in front about the existence of which he knew nothing.

Suddenly sweeping round a curve, he came in sight of it.

It was a toll-gate, and as the hour was now very late, it was closed, and so double-locked.

"Gate—gate!" roared Dick, as soon as ever he perceived the obstruction. "Gate—gate! Quick—quick, I say!"

The sound of his voice reached the ears of the tollman, and he at once sauntered forth, lantern in hand.

"Quick—quick!" cried Dick, again, who was compelled to reduce his pace. "Open, I say—open!"

Before the gatekeeper could make any reply, the officers came in sight, and set up a yell like a pack of hungry wolves in sight of their prey.

Now we have him!" shouted Skellum, almost frantic with excitement. "Be firm and resolute—he cannot escape!"

Then raising his voice, he bawled aloud to the tollkeeper:

"A highwayman—a highwayman! A thousand pounds reward! Keep the gate shut! Don't open it for the world!"

The tollman was so astonished that it is questionable whether he understood what was said to him.

But this astonishment was quite as bad to Dick as a fixed determination to keep fast the gate, for he was deprived of action altogether.

What was to be done?

There was little or no time to deliberate upon this question.

The officers were fearfully close behind, though they did not come on quite so fast as hitherto, because they were getting their weapons in readiness and preparing for an encounter.

But Dick's mind was soon made up.

Indeed, so quickly did he come to a decision, that one would have thought his resolution had been taken long beforehand.

"Since it must be so," he muttered, "here goes! You can do it, Bess, I know."

With these words, to the intense amazement of everybody, he faced about, and for, perhaps, the space of a moment, the extraordinary phenomenon of a highwayman riding full tilt at advancing officers might have been observed.

"Stand firm!" cried Skellum, at the top of his voice.

He thought, and not unreasonably, that Dick intended to make a bold dash through their ranks.

"Be ready," he cried—"here he comes!"

The officers formed themselves into a compact and most formidable barrier across the road.

But to their still further astonishment—not to say dismay—Dick faced round again and rode towards the gate.

Black Bess knew what was required of her.

Collecting all her energies, she rose in the air and cleared the gate in most beautiful style, her hoofs not so much as grazing the bristling row of spikes with which the topmost bar of the tollgate was garnished.

Of course the reader knows Dick's reason for riding back towards his foes.

It was because he was too close to the gate for a leap to be taken safely.

By adopting the course described he was, as we have seen, completely successful.

To describe the fury and disappointment experienced by the officers would be far beyond our powers.

They were absolutely frantic, but none more so than Mr. Skellum.

This was on account of the mistake he had made.

But for falling into the blunder of preparing to receive Dick's charge, he fancied that the prize might now have been his.

Now the chance seemed further off than ever, for Black Bess was already lost to sight in the darkness, though the clatter of her hoofs and her rider's mocking laugh of triumph still rang in his ears.

"Open the gate now, you fool, and be as quick as you can about it!" cried Skellum.

But the tollman had now recovered from a portion of his bewilderment.

What had greatly contributed to this, was the knowledge that he had been cheated out of his dues.

"Who are you calling a fool?" he asked, angrily, and without moving an inch towards obeying the command he had received.

"Come—come," said Skellum, making an attempt to moderate his wrath, "open the gate quickly, or we shall lose the rascal after all."

"Give me the money first, and then I will," was the dogged answer.

"Open, I say! We are the King's officers! Beware how you obstruct us in our duty!"

"I don't care if you are the King himself," was the, if possible, more dogged than ever reply; "and as for obstructing you in your duty, take my word, you don't pass through this here gate without paying. It's tuppence apiece."

Mr. Skellum swore awfully.

"You had better give him the money," urged the officer next to him, "or we shall never get through to-night. There's just a dozen of us, including yourself, so it will be exactly two shillings."

Skellum ground his teeth and thrust his hand into his pocket, from which he drew forth the requisite amount.

"Here, fellow! Take it, and open the gate quickly, or you may suffer for your obstinacy."

The man did no more than growl by way of reply.

Then in the most leisurely and aggravating manner possible, he held up his lantern and proceeded to count "heads" as he called it.

Skellum was in agony.

"Will you let us through or not?"

"Seven—eight," said the tollman, not heeding him, and going on steadily with the counting business.

"Open the gate, or I'll break your d—d neck for you!" yelled Skellum, almost black in the face.

"Eleven—twelve," said the tollman, lowering his lantern, "and one that went over the top, thirteen. I want just tuppence more."

That was the last drop in Skellum's cup which caused it to overflow.

He was about to descend from his steed and inflict summary chastisement upon the refractory tollman, when doubtless a regular fracas would have ensued, but one of his men seized him by the arm while another slipped the extra twopence into the tollman's outstretched palm, who no sooner felt the coins than he hastened to open the gate.

CHAPTER MXCVI.

MR. SKELLUM FINDS HIS TASK MORE DIFFICULT THAN HE IMAGINED IT.

It was only the rattle of the key in the padlock that restored Skellum to something like composure.

Still, it was only by a very great effort that he controlled himself; but he was enabled to do so by the reflection that if he alighted so much time would be lost that the pursuit of Dick would be a hopeless matter.

But for all that, he shook his clenched fists and vowed vengeance upon him ere long.

The tollman took his threats with marvellous composure, however.

The next moment the ponderous gate swung open; and when there was no bar to their progress all things were forgotten in the general desire to get upon the track again as speedy as possible.

The excited fancy of the officers made them think that the delay had been much greater than it was in reality.

Still, the time had been long enough for Black Bess to get out of hearing.

"Never mind," said Skellum—"we shall make up that, no doubt, for the fellow has but the one horse, and the farther he goes the more tired he must get, while as for us, we are continually having fresh ones, so that, you see, we must get the advantage in time."

The men seemed encouraged and satisfied with this prospect, which certainly seemed reasonable enough.

Their cattle at present were, comparatively speaking, fresh, and under the combined stimulus of whip, voice, and spur, got over the ground at an amazing rate.

Dick, however, was not going so rapidly.

Not on account of any flagging upon his mare's part, but because the road was hard and heavy, and he was nursing her powers for a final effort.

After little more than an hour's hard riding, the sound produced by the hoofs of Black Bess striking against the hard roadway reached their ears.

This caused them to redouble their efforts.

More whip, more spur, more cries, and then, as the moon once more broke through the clouds which had obscured her light, they found themselves within sight of the highwayman.

"The reward is as good as in our pockets!" cried Skellum, by way of animating his followers. "You can see his horse is growing more and more exhausted; and bear in mind at the next inn we come to we shall find horses ready and waiting for us. We shall be able to make better speed than ever. Rely upon it, another dozen miles must settle the business!"

The officers inwardly most devoutly hoped that this would prove to be the case, for though, for the most part, they were well used to the saddle, yet this long gallop without any rest told greatly upon them.

Of course Dick heard them not far behind him, but the circumstance failed to cause him the least uneasiness.

He knew perfectly well that he could, without difficulty maintain a safe distance between himself and them, no matter how great their speed.

Owing to his care Black Bess evinced no more tokens of distress than when he made his first halt at Edmonton.

As the officers came on he slightly increased his speed, a thing easily enough accomplished, for all he had to do was to allow the rein to fall a little loose on her neck.

Onward then she stretched, covering the ground with a scarcely perceptible exertion.

Mr. Skellum saw that the distance between them, if not increasing, was certainly no less than before.

"Whip and spur!" he cried aloud, suiting the action to the word as he thus spoke. "Bear in mind that at the very next inn we come to we can change these brutes Don't forget that. We are sure to have him."

Dick Turpin, riding on, came, presently, to the inn of which Skellum had thus spoken.

It was a most peaceful, picturesque dwelling—looking especially so now that the slant rays of the setting moon fell upon it.

Fain would Dick have paused there a moment or two for his mare's sake, in that quiet spot; and as he dashed by his eyes were turned wistfully towards it.

But a halt then, no matter how brief, was utterly impossible, and Black Bess continued on her course.

On this occasion, however, Dick became acquainted with the tactics of his pursuers.

How they had contrived to keep up with him so long had hitherto been a complete mystery to him.

Now it was a mystery no longer.

They changed their horses at short stages.

It must be confessed that this discovery brought a slight shade of anxiety to his brow, but the expression quickly faded, and a glance of triumph and anticipated success succeeded.

"No matter," he exclaimed, in a determined voice, "they can have twenty horses each if they are so inclined, but I will keep my oath. I have sworn to ride to York, and I will do it in defiance of every obstacle."

As he uttered these last words he turned round towards his foes.

They were some distance in the rear, but, nevertheless, the now dim and sickly moonlight enabled him to distinguish them.

He uttered a loud shout.

The cry was an inarticulate one, and yet, for all that, wonderfully expressive of what he wanted to convey.

The sound was one of defiance and determination, mingled with contempt of their efforts.

This done, he not only allowed Bess the rein, but also spoke to her in animated tones, urging her to make use of her best powers.

This alteration was consequent upon the discovery he had just made.

To the intense mortification and disappointment, then of Mr. Skellum and his party, Black Bess all at once doubled her speed, and in a few seconds got not only out of sight but out of hearing too.

But he was worked up to too great a pitch of desperation to think of abandoning the chase.

"It is but a flash in the pan!" he ejaculated, as he saw the countenances of his companions assume a dejected air. "It is like the lighting up of a candle just before it goes out. Keep on steadfastly, and remember that the race is not always to the swift."

Skellum certainly set his men a good example.

But, then, he had every incentive to exertion.

Moreover, by this time a personal feeling had begun to infuse itself into the matter.

Dick Turpin was not looked upon so much as a fugitive from justice and a breaker of the laws as he was considered to be a personal enemy, depriving them of that to which they believed themselves justly entitled.

This feeling was shared in by all the men, but particularly by Skellum, who was flushed with the success he had already met with, which made him feel that his reputation would not allow him to let Dick Turpin get off.

Consequently, although his horse was by no means the best, yet, by dint of great exertion, he contrived to keep well in advance of the rest, who could not for shame's sake lag far behind.

But Mr. Skellum was wofully deceived when he thought that this increase in Black Bess's speed was only a sudden spurt which would be over in the course of a few minutes.

The gallant animal, for the first time almost that night, could be said to be putting forth her wonderful powers of speed and endurance.

"On, my lass!" her rider would cry, with gladsome exultation. "On—on! Put forth your best speed, old girl; and when we reach the hundredth mile you shall have an hour or two's good rest; then, I know full well, you will be as fresh as ever, and well able to perform the rest of your long journey. On—on, my bonny Black Bess; there shall come a good rest after this!"

But judging by the rate at which she now flew onwards, one would have judged that there was little need to urge her.

The ground seemed to slip beneath her feet.

On and on—miles and miles of the level well-kept high-road are overpassed.

The moon has now quite sunk from sight behind the long, low-lying cloud on the western horizon.

There is no light upon the face of nature save that feeble illumination which proceeds from the thousand sparkling stars in the blue sky above.

About the hour Dick knows little, though the setting of the moon warns him that morning is coming on.

Then suddenly upon accomplishing the ascent of a long hill he finds before him a quiet-looking town of considerable extent.

There are but a few twinkling lights to be seen here and there, yet, in spite of the obscurity, the highwayman can make out the outlines of the buildings, while here and there a spire pointing upwards to the sky forms a conspicuous object.

"That should be Huntingdon," said Dick, as Bess galloped down the hill. "Yes—yes—it is—it is, for here is the sluggish river Ouse."

Before he had finished speaking the ancient town was entered, and Black Bess's hoofs raised a clattering uproar as she crossed the bridge with unabated speed.

Another moment and the town was left behind.

The open country was before him.

But Dick's breast was filled with exultation, and he manifested his joy by a thousand extravagant demonstrations.

More than sixty miles had now been accomplished since he had first set out.

Sixty miles! and he felt convinced that his journey had not occupied four hours.

But by degrees a great change came over Bess.

Her glossy skin had first of all got rough and staring with the sweat that dropped down from her sides in spots and fell upon the ground like drops of rain.

Her mouth was open and filled with white foam, which every now and then detached itself and flew in snowy masses upon her breast, her shoulders, and upon her rider.

Her nostrils, too, were widely expanded, and Dick could feel how much her respiration was accelerated.

None of these symptoms were, however, considered by her rider to be at all dangerous or calculated to excite apprehension.

"Forward—forward!" was still Dick's cry. "An effort for a little longer, and then you shall have rest. In spite of all their boasted arrangements the police officers must by this time be miles and miles behind. You shall rest even if I have to wait till they come up to us again. On, Bess, my lass, on—on!"

Although her speed was as great as ever it had been during the whole of the ride, yet upon hearing her master's voice addressing her in these tones, there was a palpable effort on her part to go faster and faster still.

Dick, in a kind of triumphant ecstasy, flung the reins upon her neck, and submitted himself wholly to her control.

Many and many were the wondering eyes turned upon him as he thus flew past travellers on the road, coming no sooner in sight than he had vanished again.

All were struck with wonder at the transient glimpse of a man having every appearance of wildness about him, waving his arms in the air, and every now and then giving utterance to a loud cry, and a horse covered with white foam, and so reeking with perspiration as to leave a long train of vapour, like a mimic fog, gleaming behind it in the damp atmosphere.

Such an extraordinary apparition as this might well excite comment.

Unheeding everything, however, but the design which he had immediately in view, Dick Turpin kept on.

Another hour elapsed, and over twenty miles were added.

Still the road stretched out before him, and still he galloped on, though every mile now perceptibly increased his mare's distress.

The point which he had determined on was, however, such a little distance on that he could not bring himself to think of allowing her to release her efforts.

Still Black Bess grew more and more exhausted.

For the first time her rider felt her flag.

As he did so his heart smote him.

She flagged again.

"Enough," he ejaculated—"I will try your powers no further, my old lass. We will make a halt at the next inn we come to."

At a slightly diminished speed a distance of about half a dozen miles was accomplished, and then Dick saw before him what he sought.

"Bravo, Bess!" he cried—"bravo, old girl! You have behaved yourself nobly—most gallantly; and now, no matter at what risk, you shall stop until your exhausted energies are restored. That is it, Bess! Quietly, now—quietly! That's it!

CHAPTER MXCVII.

THE POLICE OFFICERS REACH THE STABLE IN WHICH DICK TURPIN AND BLACK BESS ARE RESTING.

"HILLOA!" cried Dick, in a loud voice, as he hammered furiously with the butt-end of a pistol against the gate communicating with the stable-yard of the inn—"hilloa! Ostler—ostler, where are you? Hilloa, I say!"

More knocking succeeded, and finally a gruff, harsh voice coming from some distance, said:

"Wait a bit, then—wait a bit, can't you? Have a moment's patience, do!"

"All right!" said Dick. "But the quicker you are the more it will be in your pocket."

"Eh?"

"I shall deduct a shilling off the amount I intend to give you for every moment you keep me waiting."

This avowal made a wonderful difference to the gruff voice, for it changed its tone and came nearer.

"I'm here—I'm here! Just give me time to undo the gate—that's all!"

Just as the voice finished, the gate opened, and showed who the speaker was.

He proved to be a tall, thin, wiry-looking individual, whose whole appearance bore the unmistakable stamp of a connection with horses and stables.

He carried a stable-lantern in his hand, and he held it up in a convenient position for dispersing the rays, for he was in no slight degree curious to see his nocturnal visitant.

But Dick was not inclined to stand even for a moment merely that the ostler might scrutinise him.

"Stand aside," he cried, imperatively, "and shut the door quickly."

The man obeyed, for there was something in Dick's manner that made him sensible it was best for him to do so.

Dick then, with great swiftness, slipped from the saddle.

Black Bess panted fearfully.

In order to ease her, Dick, with a nimbleness that astonished the ostler, removed the whole of her trappings, and flung them upon the ground.

"My eyes!" ejaculated the latter, "you seem as though you had been coming along a bit!"

"I have. Fetch me a whisp of hay or straw—now, in a moment!"

The man muttered grumblingly below his voice, but what it was Dick did not trouble himself to hear.

He was full of concern about his mare, and examined her with anxious solicitude until the ostler returned.

"Hold the light," cried Turpin, in the same tone of command—"hold the light, and I will do the rest."

So saying, he took a portion of the hay that had been brought, and, rolling it up in his hand, formed a kind of pad, with which he rubbed his mare from head to foot in a manner that called forth the warmest admiration and approval from the ostler.

"You'd get the prize at that job, gaffer," he said, almost as gruffly as ever. "I never saw it better done. Capital—capital!"

Dick went on steadily with his work, apparently unheedful of these appreciative remarks.

At length, when he had nearly made a finish, he asked:

"Can you get into the house?"

"Of course I can! What do you want?"

"A quart bottle of brandy."

"A quart?"

"Yes, I said a quart; and mind it is the very best you have in your house."

"Very well."

"And be quick! Put the lantern on the water-butt—that will do."

The ostler shuffled off, and Dick renewed his scrutiny of his mare.

"Not much the worse," muttered Dick, after a close investigation—"not much the worse; and after what I am about to do there will be very little the matter."

The ostler did not return, and, short as the time was that he had been absent, Dick was full of impatience.

Taking the lantern, he searched about for a stable-bucket, and, having found one, proceeded to fill it at the water-butt.

He had just finished this when the ostler reappeared.

"Here's the brandy."

Dick could not wait to have the cork extracted in the usual way.

He set to work in a much more expeditious way by knocking off the neck by one dexterous blow with the butt-end of a pistol.

To the ostler's still further amazement Dick poured the brandy into the bucket, which was not much more than half full of water.

"My eyes!" he ejaculated, in wonder. "Will your mare drink that?"

"I don't intend to let her try."

"Maybe yourself, then?"

"No," answered Dick, as he allowed the last drops of the spirit to trickle out of the bottle; "I don't in a general way take the refreshment out of a bucket. Where's a sponge?"

"A eponge?"

"Yes."

"You shall have one in a moment."

The ostler's curiosity was now strongly excited, and the strong desire to know what he was going to do caused him to make use of the utmost expedition.

Quickly returning with the article required, he stood stock still to see what was going to happen next.

His surprise was, if possible, increased, when he saw Dick Turpin dip the sponge into the bucket of brandy-and-water, and proceed to bathe Black Bess thoroughly from head to foot.

By this means all fear of a chill was effectually precluded, while the strength of the spirit would cause a reactionary glow throughout the whole system.

It might not actually have been the case, but yet Dick fancied that already he could perceive the effects of what he had done—Black Bess seemed so far refreshed as to be able to recommence her journey.

She no longer panted for her labouring breath, her eye was no longer so dilated, her nostrils quivered less and were less expanded, while no foam appeared upon her lips.

During the last few moments, however, the ostler had been regarding the highwayman attentively, and now, upon looking up he found the man's eyes fixed intently upon him.

He understood the glance, and said quietly, though at the same time he touched a pistol in a significant, not to say threatening manner:

"You know me!"

It was in vain for the man to deny, and perhaps it was with the view of converting necessity into a virtue that he said:

"I do know you, captain, and I know your mare, too, and I am heartily pleased to see you both. You need not show your pistols—Ned Hartill is not the man you have got to be afraid of."

"I am glad to hear it," said Dick, extending his hand. "Depend upon it I shall not leave your services unrewarded."

"I know all about that," answered the man, who took the highwayman's proffered hand with what was manifestly pleased alacrity.

"Now show me the way to the stables."

"All right. This way—this way."

Leading Black Bess by the forelock, Dick Turpin followed his guide, and was not a little pleased to find the stable was a warm and comfortable one.

He would not speak or answer any questions until he had carefully mixed a meal of corn and placed it in the manger.

By the time he had done it, however, he felt himself utterly exhausted, and flung himself down at full length upon the straw, giving utterance as he did so to a long-drawn sigh of relief.

"You are right," he cried, in a voice which he strove to render sprightly and careless in tone. "We have ridden a long way."

"How far, captain?"

"From London."

"London?" ejaculated the ostler, in a way that showed he was greatly taken by surprise.

"Yes," responded Dick. "How far do you reckon it from here? About a hundred miles, do you not?"

"You are as good as a conjuror, for I believe I may say as it is as near to ninety-nine miles and three-quarters as makes no matter."

The highwayman's countenance lighted up with a smile of triumph.

"I knew it—I knew it!" he cried, exultingly.

"Knew what, captain?"

He did not think fit to answer this interrogation, however, but replied by asking another question.

"How long do you think I have been coming, Ned?"

"What, from London?"

"Yes."

"Oh, I don't know. You have come sharpish this last bit—perhaps a couple of days."

"A couple of days?" iterated Turpin, with a laugh of scornful derision. "A couple of days? What can the man be thinking of?"

"Less than that then, captain?"

"Less than that!" he echoed, contemptuously. "I don't know precisely what the hour may be now, but at nine o'clock last night I was in Drury Lane."

"Where's that?"

"Why, in the heart of London. What's the time now?"

"Look here," said the ostler, with a solemn air and extraordinary emphasis, "do you mean for to go for to tell me that you was in London last night?"

"I certainly was."

"Well, captain, if anybody else had told me that I should have up in a minute and said that's a lie."

"Never mind," said the highwayman, impatiently "What is the time?"

"I'll tell you in a brace of snaps. I ain't got a gold and jewelled repeater, captain, but I've got a machine that will tell the time as well as the most of them."

After much tugging and struggling the ostler succeeded in producing from his fob something which he had very rightly designated a "machine."

It was one of the largest watches Dick had ever seen, and, of course, he had had in his time no ordinary experience.

"Bless me!" he ejaculated. "Why, you must have pocketed the eight-day clock by mistake!"

"Nothing of the sort, captain. This is one of the good old-fashioned sort of watches. This belonged to my grandfather, this did. It ain't like none of your new-fangled concerns, no bigger, perhaps, than your thumb-nail, but a regular out-and-outer—one that's got some works inside."

"So I should think," said Dick—"there's room enough. And if ever they build a church hereabouts I should recommend you to make the churchwardens a present of it. It would save putting the parish to the expense of a new clock for the steeple."

"Never mind, captain—poke your fun as much as you like."

"Tell me the time. Oh, I see, it's half-past four. I scarcely thought it so late," he added, with a slight shade upon his face.

"Now don't go for to make a mistake, captain. You don't know this here watch of mine like I do. It's got its peculiarities. Now it's just three o'clock, though an ordinary observer like yourself would think it was half-past four."

"That's more like the time," said Turpin, brightening up. "I was certain I had not been more than six hours performing the journey."

"Six hours! Why, captain, you don't mean to say you've rode that poor creature a hundred miles in six hours."

"I will take an oath of it at any minute."

"Well—well, no one would guess it to look at her now. Brandy-and-water is an excellent thing, captain—a wonderful thing."

"It is; and that reminds me that a little would be very acceptable to me. Fetch enough for the pair of us."

"Shall you stop long?"

"An hour or two."

"Then perhaps you would like something to eat?"

"Certainly I should. Run and bring me whatever you can lay hold of the quickest."

"All right."

He vanished.

As soon as the highwayman was alone, he murmured:

"Six hours—only six hours! Who will believe that the distance has been performed in so short a time? Why, let me see, the officers themselves, if they only keep up the chase, will be compelled to testify to it. We must not stop much more than an hour, old girl," he added, addressing his steed; "if we do, not only will your legs get stiff, but we shall not perform the journey to time. I can see now that we shall do it in twelve hours. Ha, ha! At nine o'clock last night there will be abundant testimony that I was in Drury Lane. I will take good care there is proof enough I am in York at nine o'clock to-morrow morning."

The prospect of accomplishing this feat, which he looked upon already as almost achieved, presented itself more and more temptingly to his imagination.

At this moment the ostler returned.

He brought with him an abundant supply of provisions, as well as a bottle of brandy.

"There," he exclaimed, complacently, "we shall not do so very badly after all!"

As may be supposed, Dick Turpin by this time felt pretty keenly the pangs of hunger, which the sight of the food before him served to increase.

He began to eat ravenously, and while he was so engaged the ostler entered into conversation.

"You don't understand my watch," he began, "but it generally gains about thirty minutes every hour, and as it is about three hours since I wound it up, why, you see, of course it must be near enough an hour and a half too fast."

The ostler spoke with as much importance as though he had succeeded in establishing beyond all possibility of cavil some mathematical difficulty.

Dick nodded.

"And, oh!" he exclaimed, with great suddenness, and in very different tones, "there is something else I meant to tell you, but I have been in such a fluster like ever since you came that it quite drove it out of my head."

"What is the matter?"

"Nothing much. Are you pursued?"

"I think so."

"And where are the grabs?"

"A good many miles behind."

"Well, that may be; but just let me advise you to be careful."

"Careful? Why?"

"Get off this high-road as soon as you can."

"What for?"

"Because in the stable next to this we've got twelve horses all ready for instant use, in case the officers should ride up and ask for them."

"Can it be possible?"

"I will show you the animals if you like."

"No—no. I believe you—of course I believe you."

Dick pressed his hand to his forehead with a slightly-troubled air.

"And how far have they carried out this plan?" he asked, after a pause. "Have they arranged changing-places as far as York?"

"I think so," was the cautious answer; "but, mind you, I don't say for certain. But, however, don't you go for to run the risk; get off across the country as soon as you can."

Dick shook his head with a very resolute air.

"You won't do it?"

"I will not."

"But why?"

"Because," said Dick, speaking with peculiar earnestness, "I have made a vow to ride to York—ay, and to be there when the clock in the old minster proclaims the hour of nine. Don't look so amazed, man—I have sworn to do it!"

"You must be mad!"

"Nothing of the sort. And as surely as the sun will rise to-morrow morning I shall be there."

"And you are going to ride poor Black Bess?"

"Yes. But why do you say 'poor?'"

"Because it will be the last journey she will make."

"Pho, pho!"

"It will finish her," said the ostler. "You can believe me or not, just as you think proper; but I have not lived all these years without knowing a thing or two about horseflesh."

"She will do it with ease."

"So you think."

"Look at her now."

"Ay, ay—I see her plain enough, but I know that mare's nature as well as if I saw the end. She will go and go at her full speed until the end of her power is reached. Mind, there will be no flagging—she will go till she drops under you as though struck by lightning."

The earnest way in which the ostler spoke made an evident impression upon Turpin.

He gazed affectionately upon his mare.

"If I lose her," he muttered, "I lose all I have on earth. If I thought it would end so—— But no, no—better that she should perish thus than end her days at the knacker's yard. No, no—she shall die as she has lived. Besides, I have sworn it."

"And you are still resolved to go?"

"I will keep my oath."

"Then it is the same as signing her death-warrant."

"Why, look at her," cried the highwayman, who, having finished his repast, now rose and patted her upon the neck. "What sign of failure can you find about her? She is good for double the distance at this present minute."

The ostler shook his head as he firmly pronounced the word:

"Never!"

"Well, we shall see," was the reply. "She will either do it or perish in the effort."

"Then, if that is your determination," said the ostler, and it almost seemed as though the rough fellow's tones were tinged with sadness—"if your mind is made up, I will help you."

"Help me?"

"Yes; I would not do it, though, only I have heard that when Dick Turpin once decided upon a course, nothing had power to turn him from it."

"You heard rightly; and, what is more, he never was half so fixed in any determination as he is in this."

The ostler sighed, and then he repeated the words:

"I will help you."

"How—how?" asked Turpin, eagerly.

By way of reply, Ned went to a particular corner of the stable, and, standing on the corn-bin, felt about upon a narrow shelf that was fixed against the wall at some distance above his head.

He produced a small bottle containing some dark liquid, in quantity, probably about a couple of ounces.

"Take that," he said—"take that, and keep it carefully."

"What am I to do with it?"

"I will tell you. That bottle of stuff was given me by one of the cleverest fellows with horses that ever lived."

"But what is it for?"

"Do not be impatient. He assured me—and I would take his word for a thousand pounds—that this little drop poured down a horse's throat, even at the moment when he appeared to be completely worn out by exhaustion, would have the effect of filling his body with new blood—with new spirit."

"Can it be possible?" ejaculated Dick, taking the bottle eagerly.

"You may rely upon the truth of what I say. But let me entreat you not to make use of it unless you can help it."

"Why not?"

"Because I will not be answerable for the effects which it may leave behind it when its power has worked off."

"Then, rely upon it, I shall only make use of it as the last resort—when there is no other chance left."

"Enough."

Dick consigned the vial to a small pocket in his vest.

"I have kept the bottle by me until now, little thinking what I should do with it."

"You shall have a liberal recompense," said Turpin; "you will find that a highwayman knows how to pay for such services as these."

"Hark," said the ostler—"hark—hark! What is that?"

Dick immediately assumed a listening attitude.

But no particular acuteness of hearing was requisite.

Horses were close at hand.

The clatter of their hoofs upon the hard high-road could be heard with most unpleasant distinctness, for it showed that they were very close at hand.

Indeed, it will seem strange that their approach had not been heard earlier, but Dick did not anticipate their arrival so soon; besides, they had both been so entirely absorbed in discussing the qualities of the liquid in the bottle, that they had been insensible to all else.

Dick Turpin had no doubt that they were his foes who were outside, and he estimated the amount of desperation they would exhibit by the pertinacity with which they had kept upon his trail.

Although aided by horses as they had been, it was no trifling thing to ride so far in so short a period.

He was amazed, too, that they should arrive so soon, even after he had made every allowance.

But his brow darkened, and he sought his pistols with a menacing air.

"What are you going to do, captain?" cried Ned, as he rapidly secured the door of the stable. "What are you going to do?"

"Fight it out!" was the highwayman's laconic and grim reply.

"Nothing of the sort! Put up your barkers, captain—they will not serve you this time. Put them up, I say, and attend to me."

"What is to be done?"

"Help me on with the saddle and bridle, and while you are doing so I will tell you."

Dick did not hesitate to carry this mandate into execution.

With two pairs of such ready hands, Black Bess was very speedily accoutred.

But before Ned the ostler could say a word, a troop of horsemen stopped with a sudden dash at the yard gate.

Immediately followed a tremendous knocking.

Then came a furious peal upon the bell, and, in fact, such an uproar as probably never before had been heard at that old inn.

As Dick had rightly guessed, these horsemen were, indeed, the police officers who had chased him from London.

The indefatigable Mr. Skellum was still at their head, and, in fact, had it not been for his almost superhuman exertions the chase would have been abandoned long ago.

But he continued to keep the men tolerably well up to the mark by his perpetual assurances that the highwayman's steed could not possibly hold out much longer.

And these assertions received some colour from the accounts they received from the travellers on the road.

There was no difficulty in obtaining tidings of Dick—none in the least.

Everybody had seen him—everybody had noticed his wild and haggard look, and commented upon his foaming, panting, and well-nigh exhausted steed.

By dint, then, of availing themselves of the relays provided, and never pausing a moment longer than was absolutely necessary, they contrived to catch up with the object of their pursuit in the manner we have described—that is to say, after he had made a halt of very nearly an hour.

The racket they made had the very natural effect of rousing the landlord, who jumped out of bed half asleep, with a vague consciousness that something very dreadful was the matter.

In a moment he had opened the little latticed casement in his bed-room, and projected his night-capped head.

His alarm grew greater when he caught sight of so many well-armed men around his door.

"What is the matter?" he asked, in a quivering voice.

"Matter?" retorted Skellum. "It is a fine thing, is it not, for his Majesty's officers to be kept here like this? We want the relays of horses."

"Oh, certainly—certainly! The ostler is there, and will attend to you, gentlemen."

"He may be there," said Skellum, "but he is not here, and we cannot attract his attention."

"That's odd. He is about, I know, for I saw him open that gate about half an hour ago and let in a traveller."

"A traveller!" cried Skellum, vaguely seizing upon this item of information. "What sort of a traveller?—did you see him?"

"Yes."

"What did he look like?" was the feverish question.

"Why, a man on horseback."

"A black horse?"

"Yes."

"And did it seem to have travelled far?"

"Yes, and fast too, for it was covered with foam."

"And how long has that traveller been gone?"

"He has not gone at all. His horse must be now in the stable, for I have not heard him depart."

"And I suppose," added Skellum, scarcely able to control the agitation of his voice—"I suppose you would have been sure to hear it?"

"Certain."

This was enough.

Skellum turned to his companions.

He was so excited that his teeth chattered together, while his voice shook so that what he said was with difficulty distinguished.

"Now we have him at last," he said. "Beyond all doubt he is here. Ten to one if his mare is not lying down in the stable dead beat. For all we know he may be keeping back the ostler by main force, or it may be there is complicity in the case. However, that he will make a bold stand for his life is certain. But you must precipitate yourselves upon him so as to put an end to his existence as quickly as you can. Do you hear me?"

"Yes—yes."

The men looked determined enough.

"If you let him slip through your fingers you will have only yourselves to blame. Now then! In the first place, down with that gate!"

The officers dismounted.

One thing to Mr. Skellum's credit is, that he never proposed anything to be done by his men that he did not share in himself.

On the present occasion he was the first to make a rush at the gate.

The others followed him, and the sudden and combined pressure of so many men caused the lock and bolts to fly in all directions.

The feeble glimmer of a light shining through the chinks of a door pointed out the whereabouts of the stables.

In this direction they all rushed without a moment's pause.

They flung themselves against the door; but it was strong, and though it shook from the violence of the attack, yet it offered an effectual impediment to their entrance.

"Hullo," cried a gruff, surly voice at this moment—"hullo there! Murder!—fire!—police! Help—help! Murder!"

[DICK TURPIN ONCE MORE MEETS WITH CAPTAIN HAWK.]

Amazed beyond expression, the officers looked round in order to find out whence this voice proceeded.

Gazing upward, they saw the upper half of a gaunt figure projected through the circular window of the loft over the stable.

It was Ned the ostler.

"Master—master!" he bawled. "Thieves—thieves! Robbers!—murder!"

"Silence, you d—d idiot!" yelled Skellum, frantic with fury. "What is the matter?"

"Well, that's a good 'un, that is."

"Why, I do believe," exclaimed the officer standing next to Skellum, "that he is fool enough to take us all for a band of robbers."

"Yes, and a mighty fine take you would be," grinned Ned.

"He cannot be so great a fool!" cried Skellum. "Hark ye, my spark," he added, in what he intended should be a tone of solemn warning—"hark ye! We are police officers—his Majesty's police officers—in quest of Dick Turpin, the highwayman, who, as we know very well, is in here!"

Ned shook his head.

"We have certain information."

"Then I'll prove you're wrong," answered the ostler, "for I will come down and open the door this minute; but you must give me time to put a few of my togs on."

This last speech somewhat staggered Skellum's confidence; and he would have felt more staggered still but for the fact that when he entered the yard he had seen a light burning in the stable, and which was suddenly extinguished.

The ostler did not put their patience to a very severe trial.

In less than a minute after he had spoken, they heard

No. 240 will be Published next Thursday.

the sound produced by the withdrawal of rusty bolts.

The stable door then swung back upon its creaking hinges, and the moment that it did so the police officers rushed in.

Ned's lantern lighted up the interior of the place tolerably well—certainly well enough for the officers to perceive by one glance that the stable was empty.

"Rascal!" cried Skellum. "You have cheated us somehow!"

"Cheated you? Come, come—hands off, if you please!"

"Where is Dick Turpin?" cried Skellum, wrathfully.

"How on earth should I know?"

"Look here, sir—look here!" cried one of the officers, for they had all dispersed themselves over the stable, in order to search it thoroughly, leaving their leader to deal with Ned.

"What is it—what is it?"

"A door."

"A door?"

"Yes, sir, a door on this side of the stable. I'll have it open in a moment."

Mr. Skellum pressed forward.

The door was opened, and a rush of cool air came into the stable.

"Take care," growled Ned, "how you step outside; there's a hill there as steep as a housetop. Don't say I did not tell you."

What he said proved to be correct.

The officers looked down, and then uttered a shout.

"The he is," cried Skellum, with ungovernable excitement—"there he is—down at the bottom of the declivity!"

CHAPTER MXCVIII.

DICK TURPIN CONTINUES HIS RIDE TO YORK, AND TREATS BLACK BESS TO A BEEFSTEAK.

From this, no doubt the reader will be able to guess tolerably well what took place between Dick Turpin and the ostler. Still, we think it will be found more satisfactory if we give a brief outline of the events just as they occurred.

A very few words had served to free the highwayman from the anxiety he had first of all experienced.

"Take it easy, captain," Ned had said; "I will get you out of this scrape neatly enough, never fear."

"How shall you manage it?"

"There is another door leading out of this stable," was the reply. "Look, there it is."

"Where does it lead?"

"It is scarcely ever opened, because just over the threshold is about the steepest bit of ground you ever met with. No tiled roof was half as steep. But come, as you are ready—come this way and I will show you."

So saying, the ostler led the way towards the door we have already had occasion to make mention of.

He opened it quickly, and then Dick saw at the first glance that the description of the place was by no means an exaggerated one.

The earth from about a foot from the threshold sloped down in a manner that could only be characterised as precipitous.

"I can never ride down there," said Dick, positively.

"Perhaps not, but you can, I daresay, manage to scramble down—I have done it."

"But Black Bess?"

"You leave her to follow you, and you will find her four legs are quite as good as your two, rely upon it."

"It is my only chance," said Turpin. And just as he pronounced the words the officers flung themselves against the door with so much force that he made sure it would be driven from its hinges.

Hastily pressing a large amount of money into the faithful ostler's hand, he commenced his perilous descent without delay.

He called upon his mare to follow him.

Black Bess, of course, obeyed, and the ostler was proved to be right, for, being left to herself, she seemed to experience but little difficulty, save that she slipped now and then, for the ground was rather soft and of a clayey nature

The ostler, having seen that things were so far well, closed and bolted the door with marvellous alacrity; then rushing up into the loft, he appeared at the window in the way we have described.

The descent occupied so much time that Dick had barely reached the level ground below when the officers discovered him. Knowing himself to be out of pistol range, and feeling tolerably certain that his foes would not venture down such a breakneck-looking place, Dick Turpin did not manifest the least hurry in any of his motions.

As leisurely as possible he resumed his position in the saddle, and then waving his hat, rode off across the low-lying meadows in the direction of the high-road.

The officers were frantic with rage.

At first they could scarcely bring themselves to believe that they had been so extremely unfortunate as to miss their prey by such a hair's breadth.

While under the influence of this vexation they watched Dick until the obscurity had entirely concealed him from their gaze.

They then turned back to the stable, their breasts glowing with rage against the ostler.

"Seize the villain!" roared Skellum. "I will make him answerable for all this! It won't need a conjurer to arrive at his share in this business. Seize him, I say, and handcuff him securely!"

It was all very well to give this order, but a slight difficulty presented itself in attempting to carry it out.

The ostler, probably sniffing out his danger, had had the prudence to decamp, and though a hasty but rigid search was made, it failed to discover him.

He had vanished entirely.

"Never mind him," said one of the officers. "If there are fresh horses here let us have them and be off as quickly as we can. It will not do for us to be worsted after coming this far."

"Certainly not," said Skellum. "Come on. We shall overtake him in a few miles. You heard what the landlord said about the condition his horse was in?"

"Yes—yes," was the universal response, though from the manner it was given the inference might have been drawn that the circumstance had only just been brought back to their memories.

"I believe he will keep his word," said one.

"How do you mean?"

"Why, ride to York."

"Pho, pho! The thing is impossible; no one ever did it or ever will."

Long before this argument was exhausted the officers were all mounted and once more in full pursuit.

For the most part the men were heartily sick of the chase, and would gladly have availed themselves of any pretext for abandoning it.

Skellum, however, was now more determined than ever; and what is more, he felt more assured than he had yet done that he should accomplish his purpose.

Still the extraordinary distance Black Bess had already performed filled him with amazement. But for the irrefragable evidence before him, he would have steadily refused to believe it.

The fresh horses galloped very freely and swiftly along the high-road, and at the pace they were going they felt sure they should before very long hear some intelligence of the highwayman.

They were quite right.

The driver of a heavy flour waggon was the first person they encountered, and from him they learned that a mounted man answering to Dick's description had passed him at a furious gallop, some time before.

This was enough, and off they went again at a speed not far short of twenty miles an hour, which at that time was considered to be very wonderful travelling indeed.

But let us return to Dick.

After mounting at the foot of the declivity, he made his way with all possible speed towards the high-road.

No words can express the gratification caused him by the fact that brave Black Bess bounded along with as much freedom and elasticity of movement as at first.

"No fear of failure on your part!" he cried. "And as for myself, I will do my best. You fail, Bess? He knew little of your mettle, or he would never have made that remark. We shall do it. There is something within me which seems to whisper: 'We shall do it.'"

The first obstacle encountered after this was an unopened toll-bar.

At this hour the keeper of it was no doubt asleep, for pikemen must slumber sometimes.

The highwayman was disinclined to lose time in attempting to arouse him, and, also with a view of testing his mare's present powers, he urged her to the leap.

Almost as much to his surprise as delight, she cleared it with ease. He had scarcely believed that after doing so much she would have accomplished it thus easily.

Once more, then, the high-road stretched out straight and clear before him.

There was no token from behind that his pursuers were anywhere near; but, for all that, Dick did not suffer his mare to abate her speed one jot.

He had another object in view besides simply distancing his pursuers.

He was resolved to make every exertion to reach York within the time he had specified.

Now that half the distance was accomplished, every milestone that he passed made him feel how he was nearing his destination.

Besides, Black Bess was going freely, and he wanted her to do so while she had the power.

The better speed she made for the next two or three hours the longer would be the rest they would be enabled to take.

In brief, let us say that forty more miles were accomplished without one symptom of flagging and fatigue.

But after that every yard seemed to tell fearfully upon the noble creature.

Yet, although her bodily powers failed her a little, her mettle was undaunted—her spirit unsubdued; and it was, Dick fancied, with a feeling of absolute annoyance that she galloped on, striving to rise superior to her muscular strength.

But it could not be.

How keen was the pang which shot through Dick's heart every time her fast-increasing distress manifested itself!

How strange it seemed, too, for up to this moment he fancied she could do anything.

"Gently, Bess," he cried—"gently! You shall have another rest. And then what shall I do? Shall I call into requisition this bottle that the ostler gave me? Shall I drug her with that, and so endue her for a time with a factitious vigour? Alas—alas! I know not—I know not!"

His voice grew sad and hushed.

But presently he spoke again.

"I have heard of such things," he said. "I have been often told that there are concoctions of such marvellous power that they will fill the veins of an exhausted charger with fresh strength—false strength, however, for it will leave them a thousand times weaker than before. Perhaps Bess would gallop on until she fell down dead beneath me. No—no, I will not try it—that is," he added, for his mare staggered slightly, "not—yet—not—yet."

Earnestly he looked around him for some place of shelter.

But none appeared.

The darkness was intense, though it was growing towards morning very fast.

Ere long, however, he felt certain they must reach a roadside inn, for they were much more closely studded along the line of highway than they are now.

Accordingly, he spoke in cheerful strains to his steed, and he was pleased to find that, in spite of her fatigue, his voice had not altogether lost its customary influence.

But suddenly a fresh idea occurred to the highwayman, and he pursued it closely.

"Let me think a little," he cried. "There is upon my mind an indistinct recollection of having heard somewhere that a raw beefsteak, or else the warm entrails of a game cock wrapped round the bit was a stimulant of no ordinary character to an exhausted horse. I will try that. There cannot come much harm of it, and something must be done, for now that I have come thus far I am determined not to fail."

Just as he had reached this point in his reflections, he perceived in the distance the object he had been longing so to behold.

Apparently it was a halting-place of no ordinary character, for the house was large, and flanked by outbuildings of considerable extent.

To reach the inn took Dick but a few moments, and no sooner had Black Bess come to a halt than a door communicating with the stable was opened, and an ostler emerged.

"Were you expecting me," asked Dick, "that you appeared so quickly?"

"Well, no," returned the man, deliberately, and not until he had indulged himself in a long stare at the newcomers—"well, no; but I rather guess you have been pushing that horse of yourn a bit harder than you ought."

"Never mind that," cried Dick. "I want a bucket of water, a quart of brandy, a wisp of straw, and about a pound of raw beefsteak."

"Anything else?" asked the man, as soon as he had recovered his breath, which seemed to have been quite taken away by Dick's orders. "Because," he added, "if there is, I can't attend to you."

"My good fellow," said Dick, "do you see this?"

As he spoke, he held up a guinea between his finger and thumb.

"Yes, I see it."

"Well, it will be yours in about a couple of minutes, and perhaps another guinea added to it, if you do what I want you with all speed."

The man stared hard for a moment, then vanished through the doorway from which he had emerged.

Dick at once alighted, and relieved his mare by loosening her trappings.

By the time he had finished, the ostler returned.

The first thing Dick took was the wisp of straw, and with this he rubbed his mare down, and afterwards bathed her with the brandy-and-water as before.

The ostler was amazed.

"Well, you are a rum 'un, you are. I should like to know who you be."

Dick did not stop to reply, but went on steadily with his work.

"I don't wish to hurry you," added the ostler, "but perhaps you won't take it amiss if I tell you that I expect the mail-coach from York to arrive every minute."

"Thanks," said Dick; "that is important to me. I will be off before it comes."

"Then, let me tell you, you will have to be quick."

"How far is it from here to York?"

"A matter of fifty miles, or thereabouts."

Dick drew a long breath, as he murmured:

"A little more than two hours will serve for that."

Then, raising his voice, he inquired:

"What time is it?"

"Close on six."

"We shall do it," he cried—"I am certain we shall do it!"

"Do what?"

"Get to York by nine o'clock this morning."

"What! on that horse?"

"Yes."

"Never."

"Well, you will see."

"I tell you it will never be done. She is dead beat already."

"Don't make too sure of that. Where's the beefsteak?"

"Here."

Dick cut off a portion, and then, removing his mare's bridle, rolled the rest several times round the bit.

"There," he exclaimed, "that will be as much good to her as a feed of corn and a two hours' rest—mark my words if it is not."

The attention bestowed upon Bess had made a very great difference in her appearance—so great, that one would scarcely have taken her for the same animal.

A small quantity of brandy-and-water was in the bucket, and this, to the surprise of Dick himself, she drank greedily.

His next proceeding was to thrust the meat-encircled bit into her mouth.

She champed at it several times, and then became reconciled to the feel of this fresh substance.

"Blow me, if that isn't a rum start!" ejaculated the ostler. "I was born in a stable and reared in a hay-loft, but I never heard of such a thing as that before."

"Behold the effects of it!" exclaimed Dick, delightedly. "I can see already her eye brighten, her neck arch proudly, and her fore foot paw the ground! How far do you think she has come?"

The ostler shook his head and professed himself unable to hazard a guess.

"From London! Last night at nine o'clock—or it may have been a little later—I rode out of Drury Lane. This morning by nine o'clock I shall be at the Bowling Green at York."

While Dick thus spoke, the ostler's eyes kept getting larger and larger.

He absolutely staggered back in his amazement.

It is doubtful, too, how far he would have gone had not the wall behind him brought him to a sudden stop.

"Do you mean to say that—that—you were in London at nine o'clock last night?"

"I could produce abundant evidence of it."

"Then how have you got here in the time?"

Dick's heart gave a bound of pride as he pointed to his mare.

"One horse has never brought you," exclaimed the ostler.

"It has."

"Then you must be Old Nick himself!"

"Nothing of the sort."

"Who then?"

Before Dick could reply the sound of horses' feet became audible.

"The York mail, by jingo!" ejaculated the ostler.

"No—no!" cried Turpin, hastily. "The sound comes from London."

"So it does; and I can't hear wheels, neither."

"There are no wheels," replied Dick. "Here, take these."

He gave the ostler a couple of guineas as he spoke.

"Thank ye, sir," he cried, with more deference than he had displayed hitherto. "Although you promised me the rhino, blow me if I thought you in earnest!"

Turpin mounted his mare.

No sooner had he seated himself in the saddle than Black Bess showed herself impatient to be off.

"Wonderful!" cried the ostler, though his eyes were directed down the road while he spoke—"wonderful! But it will be the death of her."

"What will?"

"Why, to ride her fifty miles further."

"I will not believe it. Look at her now! Would you think that she had already done so much?"

The ostler was forced to admit he would not.

"Hullo!" he cried. "Look here! What gentry are these coming on so fast? One would think they were riding to York as well."

"I believe they are," answered Dick, striving to pierce the obscurity, for he was anxious to see what sort of a figure his foes cut.

He fancied there was some falling off in their numbers, but could not make sure, for it would have been sheer madness to linger longer.

"Good morning!" he cried, raising his voice. "You will see I shall be as good as my word. Remember, at nine o'clock this morning, the old Bowling Green, York."

Mr. Skellum could only reply with impotent curses.

Dick did not even hear them, for, as he spoke, he loosed the reins, and off set Black Bess at a speed that the ostler had never before seen equalled.

He was still gazing at her fast-receding form when he was aroused by hearing Skellum say:

"D—n you for a fool or a rascal! Why couldn't you stop him?"

"Stop him? What for?" cried the ostler, in a surly voice.

"Don't you know who he is?"

"No. Do you?"

"Of course I do!"

"Who is it, then?"

"Why, Dick Turpin!"

"The highwayman?"

"Yes, fool!"

"And that was Black Bess?"

The ostler was so lost in admiration and astonishment that he paid no attention to the police officer's insulting manner.

"Of course it was Black Bess! He has brought us all the way from London."

The ostler was amazed, but there was no longer room to doubt the truth of what the highwayman had told him.

While this brief conversation—if so it could be called—was going forward, the officers had dismounted, and were busily at work removing the trappings.

"Now, dolt," cried Skellum, as wrathfully as ever, "find us the horses I ordered to be provided. We must be off at once, or we shall lose him after all."

"Civility don't cost much, Mr. Officer," growled the ostler.

"It is too expensive to bestow upon you."

"Oh, is it?"

"Yes. So get us the horses."

"Get 'em yourself; d—d if I do! 'Tain't my business—I am here to look after the coach."

So saying, he thrust his hands very deeply into his breeches' pockets in a manner expressive of the utmost determination, and trudged off.

Skellum so far forgot himself as to stand still cursing fearfully.

But his men, having come so far, felt that they could not possibly afford to lose all their labour, and so searched about and soon found the animals they wanted.

They accoutred them with all speed and led them out.

As soon as he caught sight of the cattle in readiness, Mr. Skellum smothered his resentment, and was the first to mount.

As he rode away, however, he again caught sight of the ostler.

"You're a fool," he yelled, "and I'll make you know it! The reward for Dick Turpin is one thousand pounds, dead or alive, and you have allowed that comfortable sum to slip through your fingers."

"I did not want to interfere with your chance of earning it, old boy," was the imperturbable reply. "I wish you luck."

In another second inn and ostler were left behind, and the troop of police officers were once more in full pursuit of the highwayman.

That they had an immense advantage over him is certain.

The horses they now bestrode were perfectly fresh, and but for the fact that the officers were very tired, and consequently, sat heavily in the saddle, they would have made wonderful speed.

As it was, they galloped not much under the rate of eighteen or twenty miles an hour.

The speed at which Black Bess left the inn was at first much greater than this, and Dick began to draw the most favourable conclusions from this circumstance.

But, to his grief, he was not long in making the discovery that Black Bess's powers of speed were not permanent, but fleeting.

Ere many miles had been overpassed at this furious rate he was sensible of symptoms of giving way.

Black Bess strove hard to disguise these tokens of flagging energy, but in vain.

An ordinary observer, or even an ordinary rider, would have failed to perceive these indications as soon as Dick did.

To all appearances her speed was unabated, and her capability of keeping up undiminished.

The highwayman, however, was sensible of a continual effort or kind of strain to do that which she had always before performed with perfect ease.

"Will she hold out," he asked himself, in anxious tones, "or will she fail when within a brief distance of the goal? My mind almost misgives me. Courage—courage, old lass—take it easy! There is time enough yet."

Cheered by her master's words, Black Bess again for a brief space appeared somewhat like herself.

But the police officers pressed fearfully upon him.

They were gaining ground too.

Dick knew it well, for the sound of their horses' hoofs kept getting more and more distinct; and now he found, by turning his head, that he could actually see them in the rear.

The officers became terribly excited upon making the discovery that they were undoubtedly and palpably gaining upon the object of their pursuit.

Mr. Skellum was loud in his congratulations.

"Didn't I tell you so?" he cried, with an exultant chuckle. "I knew very well what the end would be."

Closer and closer they came.

Less and less grew the distance intervening between themselves and the highwayman.

Dick grew anxious.

A damp, disagreeable moisture broke out all over him.

The triumphant shouts of his pursuers rang in his ears like the clangour of trumpets.

Then all at once he became sensible of another sound.

Horses were coming towards him.

Were they his foes also?

He asked himself the question with no little apprehension; for if it should be so, his position would be critical in the extreme.

That they were police officers was only likely, because it was certain that some one had been sent on in advance to provide the relays of horses which at each place had been found in readiness.

But this fear soon abated.

It was not long before the highwayman's keen sense of hearing detected that mingled with the trampling of horses' hoofs was the rumbling and grinding of carriage wheels.

The discovery caused him to draw a long breath of relief.

It was now very close indeed upon daybreak.

Indeed, it was a question whether day had not yet dawned; but still, if it had, no signs of it were perceptible.

A dense fog, which showed signs of increase rather than abatement, shrouded all things, and it was through this semi-transparent medium that Dick first caught sight of the glimmer of lights.

Then a conviction as to what it was that was approaching flashed upon him.

"It is the stage-coach," he cried—"the mail-coach from York, that the ostler told me he was waiting for. How groundless was my alarm!"

At this moment there came a puff of wind from the south-west, and the mist rolled away before it as if by magic.

A soft though dim gray light overspread the scene, and all objects were revealed with comparative brilliancy.

Before the highwayman was the glorious old lumbering stage-coach, with its team of four splendid horses snorting loudly and champing their bits, for the sagacious animals well knew that they were close to the changing house.

There was the florid-faced jolly-looking driver in front invested with all the glories of a closely-muffled great coat and gold-betrimmed felt hat.

Piled upon the roof was what seemed to be an unentangleable mass of human beings, trunks, boxes, and divers kinds of luggage.

Leaning out from behind could be seen the guard, horn in hand, preparing to give the shrill-sounding signal of their approach.

The cumbrous, heavily-laden vehicle was coming on in dashing style, and to avoid all possibility of collision with it, Dick drew to the right-hand side of the road.

But the driver, and the outside passengers as well, had caught sight of the troop of police officers in the distance, and, of course, one glance was sufficient to make them acquainted with the actual state of affairs.

Moreover, there could be no mistaking Dick Turpin for being any other than a highwayman hotly chased by officers.

Skelium saw the coach, and at the first glance saw with that readiness of thought with which he deserves to be credited, how the circumstance could not only be turned to his advantage, but also put a stop to this vexatiously long chase, of which it need scarcely be said he had for some time been heartily tired.

"Stop him!" he bawled, in such stentorian tones as would almost have justified the belief that his lungs were made of leather. "Stop him—stop him! A highwayman! Dick Turpin! A thousand pounds reward! Draw broadside across the road! That's it—that's it! Bravo—capital!"

These words which we have just set down reached with tolerable distinctness the ears of the driver of the York mail—at any rate, he understood what was wanted of him, for his actions afforded practical proof of that.

That he was a first-class coachman, the entire command he had over his horses sufficiently proved.

With what seemed like magical celerity, the vehicle was drawn broadside across the road.

So well was this done, that the hind wheels of the coach were on the brink of the ditch at one side, while the noses of the two leading horses just touched the opposite hedgerow.

The execution of this manœuvre, however, produced a kind of panic within the coach.

At first shrill screams were heard.

Then the windows were let down and eager heads thrust forth.

Those on the one side had a full view of all that was taking place, and waited the result with no little apprehension, while the others were loud in their demands to know the cause of this sudden and unprecedented stoppage.

No one could be more surprised, however, than Dick Turpin was.

Well he might be at beholding so truly formidable a barrier so suddenly placed in his path.

What was to be done?

Naturally enough, in his indecision he pulled the rein and reduced his mare's speed.

A loud, ringing, mocking laugh of triumph at this moment reached his ears.

It came from the officers behind him.

He ground his teeth with intense vexation.

He glanced quickly to the right and left, but the hedgerows were so high and so dense, and there was so little room for a preparatory gallop, as to make him feel at once that it was hopeless to attempt flight in that direction.

"His goose is cooked," was the coach-driver's complacent remark—"we have him as safe as a rat in a trap."

"Divil a doubt of that, begorra!" cried the guard behind, and he executed so hideous a fantasia of triumph upon his horn that the passengers were fain to clap their hands over their ears.

The shouts and laughter of the officers behind redoubled, while they pushed on at the utmost speed their horses were capable of making.

At the same time they did not neglect to prepare their weapons for immediate service.

Then followed on the part of everybody a breathless silence, so much anxiety was there felt as to the occurrences of the next few moments and their results.

We must describe the exact position of affairs at this juncture.

Dick Turpin, then, was in the high-road with an expression of irresolution upon his face.

Not more than fifty yards in advance of him was the insurmountable-looking barrier composed of the mail-coach and horses.

Something like half fifty yards behind him were the officers, and every fleeting second brought them wonderfully nearer, for they were coming on at the top of their speed, while Black Bess was going little faster than at a walk.

Events approached a crisis.

What was to be done?

Dick felt that he had not much time left for making up his mind.

CHAPTER MXCIX.

DICK TURPIN FINDS A MEANS OF GETTING OUT OF HIS DIFFICULTY, AND ASTONISHES THE DRIVER OF THE YORK MAIL-COACH.

A DARK and ominous frown settled quickly upon the countenance of the highwayman.

He clenched his teeth hard, while his hands wandered towards the holters.

"Cursed chance!" he cried. "What shall I do? Shall I face round and fight it out? Shall I die thus with my purpose unachieved? No—no, never—never!"

And yet while he pronounced this determination he allowed Black Bess to come to a standstill.

Oddly enough, this action caused the police officers to pause.

But they had very undefined ideas as to the powers of resistance possessed by the highwayman.

This stoppage they certainly looked upon as an act of hostility, and even Mr. Skellum thought it necessary and prudent to advance with caution.

"Cowardly knaves," muttered Turpin, with unutterable scorn, as soon as he comprehended the tactics of his adversaries, "why did they not put on a bold front and ride me down? Bess, old lass," he cried, patting her dripping neck, "shall we, who have in our time done so much to excite the wonder of others—we, who have had so many hairbreadth escapes together, and fought against such overwhelming odds—shall we, I say, shall we at last yield to such base and craven carrion as are now behind us? No—no, it shall never be! We will at least make one bold attempt at freedom."

But it was not only necessary to decide this much, but also resolve what the nature of the attempt should be.

The police officers now were coming on like men nerving themselves for some desperate encounter which they would, if possible, willingly avoid.

Still their weapons were ready in their hands, and if Dick's hesitation lasted much longer they would be within range.

It was questionable, indeed, whether they were not so already.

"There was a time when you would have thought nothing of that barrier yonder, Bess—that barrier upon which our foes appear to place so much reliance. But now, in your present exhausted state, I fear—yes, I fear to put you to it. I could never have believed such a thing as this would come to pass. I—I will try it; we can but fail, and if we do we cannot be much worse off. Yes, Bess, I will try you once more. You have now the chance of once more preserving your master's life."

We have been at some pains to make the reader perfectly acquainted with the nature of the highwayman's situation, and in consequence, some space has been occupied in so doing—this might cause an erroneous impression in the reader's mind with regard to the actual duration of time.

It must, however, be borne in mind, that all occurred very rapidly—even Dick's indecision, which we have dwelt upon at some length, could not be called other than momentary.

To those who were observing him, he seemed merely to make a pause and nothing more.

His next action, however, amazed them far more than anything which had preceded.

With extraordinary suddenness he faced round and rode a little way towards his foes, who were near enough to be able to tell by the look of his face that he had resolved upon doing something desperate.

Mr. Skellum called up all his coolness and presence of mind.

He thought he knew what Dick intended to do.

"Stand firm," he cried to his men—"stand firm, whatever you do! He thinks of dashing through us; but if you are firm he will fail in his attempt and we shall have him!"

The men immediately prepared themselves for the obeyal of this mandate.

But to their extreme rage and disappointment, Dick once more wheeled round and then galloped Black Bess towards the stage-coach.

He touched her with his spur, and she gave a bound forward as though completely maddened.

"Bravo—bravo, old lass!" he cried; and his voice rang out clear and sharp in the morning air. "Bravo—try your best—try your best! Once more your master's life depends alone upon your powers!"

Black Bess heard her master's voice, and if she did not comprehend the actual words she well enough understood the tone.

It was the same as he had made use of many a time before when he required to avail himself of her extraordinary powers.

She saw the obstacle before her, and seemed to gather up all her energies for the terrific leap.

The driver of the stage-coach saw him coming on and uttered loud shouts.

"Stop—stop! Curse the fellow—what is he after? What does he mean to do?—is he going to ride into my leaders? Woa, woa, there—stop, I say—are you mad?"

Dick Turpin paid not the least attention to these words.

Keeping to one side of the way, he rode Black Bess directly towards the two "leaders," as the driver called them, and which he had so fondly believed would prove an impassable barrier.

The two horses were standing close together, and though the feat of leaping over them was one which very few would have thought or cared about attempting, yet Dick Turpin felt assured that it was one which his mare would have accomplished easily had she been in her ordinary condition.

But after the distance she had travelled, Dick felt no slight misgivings as he rode her towards it.

The passengers on the coach looked much alarmed.

The horses, too, that were harnessed to the unwieldy vehicle, grew restive, so that the driver's care was required in attending to them.

The officers, recovering from their first panic, quickly commenced pursuit, for they did not believe it possible for any horse to clear such an obstacle.

But as she drew nearer, Black Bess's speed wonderfully increased.

"Up—up!" shouted her rider at a certain moment; and just as he pronounced the word she rose up in the air and cleared the pair of horses bravely, having apparently a foot or so to spare.

The coachman dropped his whip in astonishment, and as it happened to fall on the backs of his two horses it increased their restiveness in no slight degree.

Then the guard was so flustered that he discharged his blunderbuss in the air, thereby adding tenfold to the panic of the passengers, as well as startling the already half-frightened and consequently scarcely manageable horses.

What the guard meant to do with the blunderbuss, or why he had taken it from its receptacle, are things known only to himself.

It is possible, however, that he had some vague idea that he would be able to use it against the highwayman.

As it was, it was a mercy no one was hurt.

Dick Turpin, finding himself clear, gave vent to a loud ringing cheer, so great was the exultation at his heart.

He did not pause to look behind him, but resolved to make the most he could of the time thus gained.

He knew a little delay must take place before his foes could get fairly on his track again, and it was wise of him under present circumstances to get as good a start as he could.

But by no means anticipated such a long delay as actually took place, and which at length induced him to look behind him and see whether his pursuers had not at last abandoned the chase.

At the first glance he burst out laughing at what he beheld.

It will take us a moment or two to explain what he beheld.

The officers, then, with Mr. Skellum at their head, reached the coach not much after Dick had taken the leap.

Of course, none of them felt inclined to follow his example, but they were most anxious that the horses should be immediately turned out of their way.

But this, owing to the restiveness of the animals, proved no easy matter.

The act of a horse and rider passing over them in such a fashion they could not at all comprehend, and the "two wheelers," or horses next to the coach, happened to catch sight of the flying horseman, and in their terror naturally recoiled.

Now, had not the driver dropped his whip, he could doubtless have put an end to this retrogressive movement; as it was, he had lost his powers, and the horses continued to back most obstinately.

The passengers began to scream and shout in mingled alarm and expostulation.

The hind wheels of the coach had, by the coachman's clever manœuvre, been placed about a foot from the brink of a very wide and deep ditch.

As the horses kept backing it follows that before anything could be done the hind wheels of the vehicle ran down into the ditch, and with so much force and suddenness as to cause the coach to give such a violent lurch as to make all think its overthrow inevitable.

After much swaying to and fro, the cumbrous machine righted itself.

But their terror caused the fore horses to make quite a different movement.

With alarm increased rather than abated, they turned round very short and started forward.

In vain the coachman tugged at the reins with all his might.

In vain he cried out "Woa!"

The horses were insensible to both bit and voice.

The consequence is evident.

The coach was drawn all to one side, and after a general quiver, went over with a hideous crash.

It was at this moment that Dick happened to look behind him.

The horses were kicking and floundering in inextricable confusion, and the harness, as it gave way in various places, became more and more entangled.

Never was heard such screaming before.

The chorus was terrific.

The guard had, most unluckily for himself, been flung into a holly bush, where he stuck fast.

His yells were alarming to listen to, and not a little contributed to the general terror of the passengers.

The pain he endured in the tender parts of his anatomy would not allow him to remain still—human endurance could not bear it.

But the misfortune was that the more he floundered about in his insane and ineffectual efforts to extricate himself, the more was he tormented with the thousand prickles of the holly bush.

It was a case, however, when everybody's first and chief attention was given to number one, and all the travellers had too much to do in looking after themselves even to think about making any effort for his liberation.

Those who had occupied outside seats, of course, experienced severe contusions; and as they one by one picked themselves up and removed to a little distance, they presented truly a pitiable spectacle.

Not a few had fallen head first into the ditch, which happened to be filled almost brim full of stagnant water, overgrown with a kind of green disagreeable-looking vegetation.

It is true that the foul water and the sticky dirt which formed the bed of the ditch saved them from sustaining any severe injury, but then, when they scrambled out, they were in such a woful pickle that made them think that anything much worse could not have well befallen them.

Those inside did not escape, for the overturnment of the vehicle bumped them altogether in a terrible manner.

Most desperate were the efforts made to emerge from their place of prisonage; but they had but little result, for the only means of exit was by crawling through the coach window which was now turned upwards to the sky.

The police officers were too much intent upon the capture of the highwayman, who had given them so much trouble, to think of aiding the passengers in any way, and as soon as they could extricate themselves from the scene of confusion they did so.

The driver bawled to them for assistance, and indeed he considered that he was fully entitled to their services.

The guard alternately beseeched and commanded them to release him from the holly.

But they disregarded the words of both, and rode away amid a storm of yells and curses from the whole assemblage.

The position of the driver was by no means an enviable one, as he quickly found.

At first he had greatly congratulated himself upon the fact that he had reached the ground almost without sustaining a bruise, for a stout passenger, who had sat on the box beside him, had fallen undermost.

But the coachman was not long before he was made aware that he was not destined to get off quite easily.

The passengers having partially recovered themselves, broke out into violent language, which was not at all surprising.

Still less so was the fact that they ardently desired to be revenged upon some one.

By common consent, that some one pitched upon was the driver, whom they considered to be the source of all their troubles.

They came up to him with a menacing air, and formed round him in a dense throng.

"You villain!" cried one, shaking his clenched fist. "What do you mean by overturning the coach in this fashion, and putting all our lives in danger?"

"Ay—what do you mean by it?" iterated the rest, closing closer round him.

The coachman turned, as though he would have fled; but he only felt himself confronted by others, if possible, more menacing.

"I've a d—d good mind to horsewhip the vagabond from here to the next inn!" exclaimed one, who had picked up the article he mentioned.

"Gentlemen—gentlemen," he cried, in an expostulating tone, "don't blame me. How the devil could I help it?"

"Blame you!—who else must we blame?"

"What business had you to interfere with highwaymen?"

"None at all!" yelled the guard, who at that moment was pierced by a larger and stronger thorn than any he had hitherto experienced. "Pitch into him—give it him hot! I only wish I had the chance. Oh, d—n it!"

Another thorn called forth this last ejaculation.

The passengers scarcely needed any bidding in the matter.

They were, it is true, seeking for some pretext to attack the driver, and the guard's word proved sufficient.

To the intense satisfaction of the last-named functionary the passengers, including one or two representatives of the so-called softer sex, made a violent onslaught upon the driver, who vainly bellowed for mercy, and declared that the fault was none of his, but that he should be the greatest sufferer, because his master would expect him to repair the coach, and if he failed to do so to send him to prison.

To this the only reply he got was, that it served him well right, and hoped it would be a warning to him to mind his own business another time.

The coachman felt himself to be a much-injured individual, for he felt morally certain that if his manœuvre had caused the capture of the highwayman he would then have received as much applause as he now had abuse.

But such is the world.

The travellers only ceased their attack when compelled to do so, and finally trudged off towards the inn, whither those of their more peaceable companions had already gone.

The driver and the guard were left alone in their glory masters of the field, the former unable to rise in consequence of the severe punishment he had received, and the latter now hopelessly embedded in the holly bush.

Here we will leave them, for other and more stirring events call for our attention.

Long before the occurrence of the last incident we have described the police officers had got out of sight and hearing.

Having kept up the chase so long with so little result, it may seem strange to say that the weary, worn-out officers had now really greater hopes of success than they had yet entertained.

The reason of this was that daylight was fast coming on, and consequently they would be able to see well about them.

Moreover, there would be a greater number of people abroad, and it might be that some of them, noticing the suspicious appearance of the hard-pressed highwayman, would take upon themselves the responsibility of detaining him.

Once or twice Mr. Skellum and his adherents fancied they could hear the faint clatter of hoofs a long way in advance, but they could not satisfy themselves upon the point.

As before, however, there was no difficulty in gaining intelligence on the subject of their pursuit.

Every one they met could tell them something of the highwayman, and all agreed that he could not be far off, and that his horse appeared to be much exhausted.

Such accounts as these, coupled with the approach of day, might well make the police officers strongly of opinion that their arduous task was drawing to a close.

Still, in spite of all their efforts, they were not successful in catching sight of Dick, although they strained their eyes unceasingly in the belief that the next instant must serve to bring him before their anxious gaze.

Meanwhile, Dick Turpin continued for a long time at a hard gallop, which he knew very well Black Bess kept up with difficulty; but he was conscious he could not permit her to relax her efforts.

The adventure with the coach had given a fresh turn to his thoughts, because the excitement was so unexpected.

The ease, too, with which Black Bess had achieved her tremendous leap filled him with enthusiasm, and he drew from it the most favourable auguries of future success.

"I did not give you credit for half so much, old girl!" he cried. "On—on! Do not flag now! Keep up, brave lass! Do not fail now that so much has been accomplished—now that the end is almost in view! But why do I talk of failure? I will banish the thought. Black Bess, we must succeed! The feat performed, it will ever afterwards be spoken of with wonder. We shall never be forgotten—never while horses are made use of. On, Bess—on! Courage — courage! We are doing this for fame!"

The gallant mare responded nobly to the enthusiastic tones of her rider's voice.

But for all that, a strain could be detected; and, though the words we have just set down came from the highwayman's lips, yet in his heart there was a whisper of misgiving and of doubt.

It was, indeed, more with the hope of drowning these inward suggestions that he spoke up so loudly.

Suddenly, he perceived before him a wide river.

The name of it he knew not; but he saw the stream was wide, and that there was no bridge to connect its banks, probably on account of its great width we have spoken of.

Here was an obstacle indeed, and he wondered greatly how it was to be surmounted.

While debating this point, he slackened speed and looked well about him.

The day might now be said fairly to have begun; but the great sheet of water was covered by a shifting mass of vapour, which interfered greatly with the vision.

At last the very bank was reached, and then Dick came to a dead stop.

"There must be a ferry-boat belonging to this place; and yet where is it? Ah!" he exclaimed, as the rolling mist partly cleared away and enabled him to see the opposite bank with greater plainness, "there it is! All will now be well."

As he spoke, he placed his hands before his mouth, and gave utterance to a prolonged shout.

His voice floated across the water and was heard, for he perceived a figure make an answering signal, and directly afterwards he distinguished the faint tones of a distant voice.

"That is well," he said. "You will be able to have a brief rest now, old girl. You shall be rid of my weight, too. While the ferry-boat is coming you will have a chance of recovering your wind."

The overtaxed animal seemed very grateful for this brief respite from exertion, and turned her out-starting, glassy eyes upon her rider with an expression so truly wistful that he was compelled to turn away.

As he did so, his ears caught a faint sound.

He started and listened again, for he fancied his acute sense of hearing had deceived him.

"So close!" he ejaculated, a moment after. "I was not prepared for this. How much like bloodhounds they keep upon the trail! I—I begin to fear that they will hunt us down, after all.

"No, no—I won't think that!" he added, as though ashamed of his fears—"I won't think that—at—at least, not yet."

The sound now was more distinct.

There could be no doubt as to its character.

The officers were coming, and every moment now Dick expected would bring them within sight.

He cast an anxious glance across the water.

The huge, lumbering ferry-boat was not more than half across, for it seemed to encounter much opposition from the tide.

"It is all over," said Dick, as he caught the first glimpse of his pursuers in the distance. "By the time the boat reaches the shore they will be here—perhaps before it. Come, Bess," he added, "I would fain have spared you if I could, but there is no help for it—we must swim across."

In her wearied state, Dick reasonably enough dreaded the imposition of this task.

But he was governed by stern, inflexible necessity.

Either he would have to remain where he was until his foes arrived, or else take to the water.

Full of risk as it was, of course the highwayman chose the latter course.

Taking the rein over his arm, he led his mare into the water, and, as soon as he was deep enough, he began to swim.

She followed his example willingly enough.

Her master knew she had good swimming capabilities, and he was surprised to see what good speed she made.

The ferryman was so astonished at beholding this proceeding that for a moment he forgot it was necessary for him to bestow perpetual care upon his boat.

Being left for this moment, it veered round and drifted off with the current, which was particularly strong, but which, to Dick's advantage, set in for the shore he wished to reach, thus materially diminishing the exertion which his steed and himself were compelled to make.

It had been Dick's hope to get the ferry-boat over to the other side, and bribe the man to keep it there, so as to detain his foes. As things turned out, however, there seemed every probability that they would be able to avail themselves of it much sooner than was ordinary.

Dick thought he might yet achieve his object, and shouted to the man to put back.

But his words were either unheard or disregarded.

Dick was now in mid-stream, and the ferry-boat not much more.

This was the moment when the officers, panting and breathless with the extra efforts they had been making, reached the river's bank.

Scarce one of them had breath enough to hail the ferryman; but he saw them, and comprehended their motions.

"Quick—quick!" cried Skellum. "Come on—come on! Five pounds if you are quick! Come—come on, or I'll be d—d if the man and horse won't reach the other side first!"

Although the water made a strange gurgling in his ears, yet Dick could just hear the words uttered by his foe.

It was, therefore, only reasonable to suppose that they were heard also by the ferryman, who was now out of Turpin's sight.

Black Bess swam bravely, though her master listened with some apprehension to her laborious snorting.

As for Dick himself, a better swimmer need not be, and yet he felt anxious to reach the shore, for he was conscious that he was not in his proper element.

He was able to make capital progress, for the current seemed to increase in strength, while it certainly carried him in the direction of the shore he wished to reach.

The ferryman, on the contrary, made very little motion.

The clumsy boat was much too large to be under the management of one man only, and the current was on this morning unusually strong.

Mr. Skellum and his companions were in a state which we can only describe as being one of absolute frenzy.

They ran up and down, shouted, waved their arms, discharged their pistols over the water, and committed a hundred other extravagant actions.

It was, indeed, galling to think that after all their late exertions which had brought them so close to the object of their pursuit, that they should thus be compelled to remain in a state of absolute inaction.

The ferryman at first seemed somewhat disinclined to approach or have anything to do with such violent individuals, but the promise of a large reward and the declaration that they were police officers in pursuit of a notorious criminal, removed his scruples and abated his fears.

So soon as ever the clumsy bark was anywhere near, several of the officers rushed unbidden into the water, and assisted to drag it to the bank.

No sooner did it grate upon the sand than there was a universal and tremendous rush on the part of the police officers to obtain seats in it.

[THE DEATH OF BONNY BLACK BESS.]

This haste was so great as for a time to defeat its own object.

The ferryman was in momentary dread of witnessing the capsizement of his boat.

At last, however, both horses and men were safely got on board, and the lumbering vessel pushed off.

Its freight was unusually heavy, and its progress slow on that very account.

But the current soon began to make its influence felt.

Mr. Skellum turned to look at Dick, from whom his eyes had for a brief space been removed.

"Death and the devil!" he cried. "He has reached the shore! Curse his impudence! That shout was meant as defiance. Now he is in the saddle; and now he is off again like the wind! Row, you villain! Are we to have all our trouble thrown away through you? Quick—quick!"

It was quite a relief for Skellum and his officers to find some one they could blame, for they had a great deal of angry feeling stored up in their breasts.

Their rage was vain, for the rate of speed made by the boat could not be accelerated.

Finally, to the great relief of all, the opposite bank of the river was reached.

They disembarked with much precipitation.

No sooner had the promised gratuity been given to the ferryman than they clambered into their saddles.

Mr. Skellum seated himself somewhat gingerly, for though a good horseman, yet he could not help feeling the effects of so long a ride.

Great as was their expedition, yet when they started not only was Dick out of sight but out of hearing too.

"Never mind," said Skellum, with an undaunted voice, "we cannot give in now we have come so far! Push on! This is only a little bit of a spurt, and will soon be over! It is impossible that his mare can hold out much longer."

"It is wonderful that she has come so far," remarked one of the officers.

"Most wonderful!" assented Skellum. "I would never have believed that a horse possessed so much endurance had I not been an actual witness of it."

"It seems like witchcraft," said another.

"It does. But the end must certainly be near."

"What a thousand pities it is," cried the officer who had first spoken, "that such a magnificent creature should be in the hands of this fellow!"

"I am truly sorry," said Skellum; "she deserves a better fate. I know well enough what will be the end—he will contrive to ride her until she falls down dead beneath him—that will be her end; and we shall witness it before very long."

No more was said.

The officers were not exactly the sort of men to waste sentiment about anything.

Indeed, it is in no slight degree surprising that Black Bess should have touched them so much as she did.

The prospect of seeing her dead, and consequently her rider at their mercy, served, however, to change entirely the current of their thoughts.

Besides, while riding as they were, it was by no means an easy matter to keep up anything resembling a continued conversation.

After this, they rode on in silence.

At frequent intervals Skellum would listen intently, in the hope of hearing something of the fugitive.

Suddenly, after going some miles, he uttered an exclamation.

Then, immediately afterwards, he cried out, in a loud voice, that had a good deal of exultation in its tones:

"I can hear him—I can hear him! I am certain of it! Listen—listen, all of you! We are gaining on him! Whip and spur—whip and spur, I say! The end is close at hand!"

The officers all listened, and they were able to distinguish the distant clatter of a horse's hoofs.

All at once, Skellum cried out:

"He has stopped—he has stopped! Something has happened! Perhaps he is thrown. At any rate, something is the matter. Push on! Hurrah! we have him now, at last!"

CHAPTER MC.

DICK TURPIN TRIES THE EFFECTS OF THE OSTLER'S POTION UPON BLACK BESS.

The words just uttered by Mr. Skellum were decidedly premature.

But the reader, no doubt, is anxious to know whether Dick Turpin had been compelled to come to a halt or not.

It is hardly necessary to say that Dick reached the shore in safety.

As soon as he felt the water was shallow enough, he waded through, holding Black Bess by the bridle.

Then, shaking himself as well as he was able, so as to rid himself of as much water as he could, he uttered that shout about the character of which Mr. Skellum had made no mistake, and immediately afterwards vaulted into the saddle.

He was not without considerable misgiving, however, his dread being that swimming so far had done much towards exhausting his mare.

To his joy, however, he quickly found this to be an entire mistake.

So far from showing fatigue, it seemed as though the cold water had had a powerful reactionary effect.

Her sinews seemed braced, and her veins to be filled with fresh vigour.

Her respiration, too, was neither so hurried nor so laboured as it had been.

From all this Dick drew the most favourable auguries.

"We shall do it, Bess, my lass," he ejaculated, patting her fondly—"we shall do it—I am sure we shall! There must be no more flagging. You are not riding to York, old girl, but you are riding to fame; and the story of how you travelled will be recounted as long as horses remain beasts of burden. There will never be one to surpass you. On—on! Forward and onward yet!"

Black Bess responded bravely to her master's words; and to have seen her at this moment no one would have given credence to the fact that she had travelled so many miles in so short a time.

There was a freedom about all her movements and elasticity in her joints which delighted her rider beyond measure.

It actually seemed as though the swim across the river, much as he had dreaded it, was the most favourable circumstance that could occur.

Black Bess appeared as much refreshed by the exertion as she would have been had she enjoyed a good rest and partaken of a good feed of corn.

Dick's joy increased.

In his delight and enthusiasm, he waved his arms and shouted aloud in a manner that greatly excited the wonderment of the few travellers he happened to meet with at that early hour.

Black Bess was once more going at that wonderful stretching gallop of hers which no steed could come near.

But Dick's enthusiasm was more the effects of a wild excitement than a genuine feeling.

Although his lips gave utterance to the expressions we have recorded, yet his heart smote him severely.

He knew that the achievement of riding from London to York in the short space of twelve hours, even if accomplished, would be at the price of his mare's life.

He knew it, though with a strange wilfulness he closed his eyes to it, and, so far from abandoning his purpose, did all he could to urge her to still more exertion.

The time was drawing short, and many miles had yet to be accomplished.

Not that he despaired or even doubted success for a single moment, but he was impatient now that the ride should be over.

Away, then, they flew, at a speed which by an ordinary rider would have been considered dangerous in the extreme.

Instead of thinking so, Dick kept endeavouring to make his mare go faster still.

Suddenly, however, in the midst of her career, she stumbled.

Dick could scarcely believe the evidence of his own senses.

She had never in her life done so before.

There could be no doubt about it now, however, for she instantly fell dead lame.

Dick's heart stood still.

Such a panic took possession of him that he was unconscious of everything.

Whether he checked the rein or whether his mare had stopped of her own accord he knew not.

But all at once he awoke to the consciousness that she was standing still.

And yet consciousness did not entirely return to him.

The occurrence of the accident at this particular juncture seemed to have a paralysing effect upon him.

For some seconds he remained in the saddle as though changed to stone.

Black Bess panted terribly.

Every time her lungs expanded it seemed as though her swelling sides must burst the saddle girths.

Now that she had stopped, the perspiration rose above her like a cloud of vapour, while heavy drops fell from her flanks and reached the ground with a sullen dash.

What was to be done?

As yet, Dick had scarcely asked himself this question.

Was this to be the end?

After accomplishing so much—after all his felicitations and anticipations—was this to be the ultimate result?

The blood slowly forced itself through his veins like ice.

Then, faintly but yet distinctly, there came upon his ears a distant ringing sound.

An ordinary ear would perhaps have failed to distinguish it; but to the highwayman's educated faculties it was only too audible.

The sound told of the rapid coming of his pursuers.

And yet he sat listening, like one either stupified or else charmed from moving.

Nearer, clearer came the sound.

There was no doubt about its character.

Ere long they would be in sight

But Dick seemed now utterly abandoned to despair.

He did not seem to care what had occurred now that his scheme had been thus rudely put an end to.

With such a sigh as one might suppose would come from the breast of one in whose heart hope had been for ever annihilated, Dick left the saddle.

Dread was at his heart—a fiery mist about his eyes and brain.

What caused the lameness?

With a coolness and a manner that looked like entire indifference, he stooped to ascertain.

He was indifferent.

What did the cause of lameness matter so that the lameness itself existed?

Black Bess was lame, and being so, it was out of all question that she would be able to perform the task he had assigned to her.

He proceeded to make his examination with as much calmness as a man who had abundance of leisure.

But, in point of fact, little more than a glance was required to make him acquainted with the nature of the mischief.

In her desperate attempt to keep up her gallop she had what is technically called overreached.

That is, the sharp iron toe upon the hind shoe had struck against the heel of her fore-foot, inflicting an ugly-looking cut, from which the blood flowed profusely.

It was the sudden pain thus caused that had made Bess lame; and had her rider pushed her on instead of pulling up immediately on making the discovery, the symptoms would have disappeared very speedily.

When Turpin saw that no more mischief had been done than this, he drew a long heartfelt sigh of relief, and once more suffered himself to be buoyed up by hope.

He tore a long slip off his neckcloth and used this as a bandage.

Then, afterwards, by a speedy yet thorough examination satisfied himself that nothing else was amiss.

Yet, rapid as he was, the reader will not require to be told that several precious moments had been consumed.

At any rate, the period had been sufficient to enable his indefatigable pursuers to get into sight.

They saw him, for the morning now was bright and clear—even the warmth of the sun's rays could be felt.

They were not a little surprised to see Turpin dismounted and standing near his mare.

But they very soon arrived at the conclusion that Black Bess had met with an accident of some kind or other; and as this could not but prove an advantage to them, they pushed on as fast as an unceasing application of the whip and spur would urge them.

Dick, having brought his operations to a conclusion, looked up and saw them.

A bitter smile curled his lips.

"They are like wolves upon the track of blood, or sharks after some death-doomed wretch on board a vessel. They will hunt me to the last gasp. Never mind," he concluded, "I can defy them yet. I know Bess is all right now."

He mounted as he spoke; but how different was his mode of doing so to that which he ordinarily adopted.

It was his wont to place one hand upon the pommel, and then to spring with one bound into his seat.

Now, however, the way in which he climbed into the saddle spoke volumes as to the amount of his fatigue: and by his appearance at this moment it would seem as though he would be to the full as much exhausted as his mare upon the conclusion of the journey.

Black Bess had her ears inclined backwards, as though listening to the coming of her master's foes.

Then, no sooner did she feel him seated, than she started off of her own accord.

She went lame at first, but that was only stiffness, and it vanished quickly.

The efforts that she now made cannot be spoken of by any other term than that of superhuman.

Dick did nothing save speak encouragingly now and then.

It was hard, however, to think otherwise than that Black Bess, being fully sensible of the proximity of Dick's foes, was doing her best to increase the distance between them with the least possible delay.

As for the highwayman himself, he had no doubts whatever upon the subject, and his enthusiasm rose to its highest pitch when, on looking back after the lapse of a short interval, he saw that not only had she tried, but had succeeded.

The police officers soon found that they were even now unable to compete with her, and their blown horses had by this time become so accustomed to a brutal and continuous use of whip and spur as to be now heedless and insensible of both.

Do what they could, the officers were unable to increase the speed of their overridden beasts—indeed, they soon discovered that each moment reduced the rate most materially.

Nevertheless, Mr. Skellum did not despair.

Fresh horses were waiting for him on the road, and upon them he relied for making up lost ground.

Mile after mile thus flew by, until at last Dick again found himself upon the high-road alone—both out of sight and out of hearing of his enemies.

The reader, of course, will not be surprised to learn that Black Bess suffered fearfully.

Her terrible and palpable distress sent a pang through her master's heart, but it did not incline him to forget his purpose.

If such a thing could be possible, his determination was stronger than it had yet been.

His goal now he looked upon as being almost within sight.

The race was all but won.

It would have been strange indeed had he relented now.

But he did pull in, for there was time enough yet before him for the accomplishment of his purpose within the bounds he had set himself, and his foes, he thought, were far enough behind to render this course prudent.

Another thing that influenced him was, that a steepish bit of road lay in advance, and up this, at all hazards, he resolved that she should walk.

Her distress now appeared to be greater than ever; and had anyone seen her in her present state they would have boldly enough declared that it would be utterly impossible for her to keep on for many miles longer.

Dick almost began to think so himself.

Her condition wrung a groan from his heart.

His hand sought his waistcoat pocket.

He was thinking about the bottle that had been given him by the ostler.

Although he had no reason to doubt its efficacy, and although one would think it could never be more wanted than at the present moment, yet he felt an invincible reluctance to trying its powers.

Thoughtfully, and thus debating with himself, he rode up the hill.

On the right-hand were some very substantial-looking ricks of hay and straw, and a little way beyond a picturesque farm-house, from the chimneys of which thin wreaths of blue smoke were curling.

Dick looked upon these things with a listless eye, being, indeed, scarcely conscious that he was observing them.

As Black Bess toiled on he was wondering whether he should administer the potion or not.

A slight circumstance caused him to resolve not to do so, and also induced him to make use of another expedient.

Round the ricks of which we have made mention several fowls were strutting, cackling, and working busily.

No sooner did Dick notice them, than he gave a slight start, and muttered:

"I wonder, now, whether there is any truth in it? I am certain I have heard that the warm entrails of a game cock wrapped round the bit will give unusual vigour to a flagging steed. Why should I doubt it? The beefsteak far exceeded all my expectations; and why should not this be as efficacious? At any rate, I will try; the experiment can do no harm, and I shall be better reconciled to the use of the potion when I know it is absolutely my last resource."

While speaking these words Dick drew from his pocket a small pistol.

He gave just one glance at it to see that it was in readiness for use, and then, pointing it steadily, pulled the trigger.

There was a flash, a report, and a wreath of blue smoke.

When the latter had died away Dick saw the cock rolling on the ground in the agonies of death.

To alight from his steed, spring over the low boundary hedge, and to seize the struggling bird, took the highwayman but a moment.

A knife then put a speedy termination to his existence, and also supplied Turpin with what he wanted.

It was no very easy matter to enwrap the bit with such a mass, but he succeeded, and regained the saddle.

Black Bess was made to ascend the hill at a walk, and on reaching the summit Dick was rejoiced to see that the ground had a downward tendency as far as his eye could reach.

This was greatly in his favour.

There certainly was some strange virtue in the experiment just tried, for Black Bess appeared to be endowed with a new lease of life.

Once again she galloped freely along the high-road; and though it was not like her old rate of travelling, yet she got over the ground exceedingly well, and, what was much more important, with an evident abatement of her distress.

Whether this new-found vigour would endure was a question he hardly dared to think about. It was sufficient to know that all was well in the present.

He looked behind him many times, for he fully expected to catch sight of his pursuers.

For a long time the country was open, and the summit of the hill near the farm-house was, consequently, clearly visible.

But presently the aspect changed.

The high-road was fringed by thick-growing trees, and, besides, took a somewhat serpentine direction, so that it was now impossible for the officers to catch sight of Dick unless they got very close in his rear indeed.

Every milestone that was now passed increased the new-found hope in the highwayman's breast.

The road was getting more occupied with people, who seemed in no ordinary degree astonished at beholding our hero and Black Bess.

Suddenly, Dick's ears were assailed with a fresh sound.

It was that caused by a single horseman riding at a tremendous rate towards him.

Of this horseman Dick could not catch a glimpse in consequence of the sinuous character of the roadway.

But he could hear him distinctly enough.

The gallop, he could tell, was a long stretching one, and yet the advancing horse trod with extraordinary lightness.

"That is no ordinary animal," muttered Turpin, as he inclined a little more to the left-hand side of the road. "Ah!" he added, with a heavy sigh, "would that you, my bonny Black Bess, were only capable of covering the ground in such a style. There was a time when nothing could surpass you; but I sadly fear that time has gone by never—never to come again."

A profound fit of dejection came over him at this moment.

So profound that he forgot all about the advancing rider, in whose steed he had begun to feel so deep an interest.

He was only aroused from this fit of abstraction by seeing the stranger come at full swing round a bend in the road, and not very far ahead.

What first attracted Turpin's attention was that the approaching steed was like Black Bess: of a jetty blackness.

The rider, too, was not altogether unlike Dick himself, save that he had a much more youthful air, and that he was of a much more slender make.

He came on with such swiftness, however, that there was no opportunity of observing him very closely, or his steed either.

Yet as he flitted past, Dick felt convinced that the rider's appearance was very familiar to him—that he had indeed seen him somewhere or other.

The stranger, too, must evidently have been struck with the same idea, for directly he had gone by he reined-in his horse, and having brought him to a standstill, turned round and rode towards our hero.

Hearing some one approach, Dick looked behind, and this time recognised the rider.

"As I live," he ejaculated, "that must be Captain Hawk! What on earth can have brought him into this part of the country?"

"I think I am under no mistake," said Captain Hawk, for it was indeed he—"you are——"

"Dick Turpin, at your service."

"I thought so. Give me your hand. I am heartily glad to see you."

There could be no doubting Captain Hawk's sincerity.

His fine open countenance showed that what he had said had come from his heart.

Dick could not put on an appearance of much gaiety, but nevertheless he pressed Captain Hawk's proffered hand very warmly, for at this juncture it gave Dick a peculiar thrill of emotion to find that he had a friend.

Captain Hawk's eyes, however, at once fixed themselves upon Black Bess, and at the same time his face assumed an expression which we can only term as one of incredulous amazement.

"Good Heavens," he ejaculated, "that is never your famous mare?"

Dick bowed gravely.

"Then what on earth have you been doing with her to change so greatly? Even with you on her back I scarcely knew her. I ask again, what have you done to her?"

"Ridden her from London."

"From London!" repeated the captain, with a puzzled air. "But I don't see that accounts for it. I have ridden Satan here from London, and yet I think he never was in better trim in his life."

"But how long were you about it?"

"How long?"

"Yes."

"Well, I hardly know. I was in no hurry. I simply journeyed from place to place."

"Precisely so," said Turpin, with a smile, while his heart swelled with triumph; "but will you believe me if I tell you how long I have been coming thus far on the road to York?"

"Certainly. Why should I doubt your word?"

"Because what I am going to tell you will sound so incredible."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the captain, eagerly, for he was always much interested in everything relating to Black Bess, for the reason that he looked upon her as the only existing rival to his own splendid steed—"indeed! Let me hear it—I am all impatience."

"Well," said Dick Turpin, with great deliberation, and looking full into the face of Captain Hawk while he spoke, "I don't happen to know what the precise hour may be now——"

"Stay a moment. I will let you know precisely. I have a splendid timekeeper here."

While speaking, Captain Hawk drew from his pocket a magnificent gold repeater, the case of which was absolutely encrusted with diamonds and precious stones.

It must have been worth a small fortune.

But the light-hearted highwayman handled it as though it were the most "careless trifle" in the world.

"It is now," he said, "precisely five minutes to seven."

"Good; then I have five minutes that I can stay and chat with you, then I must be off."

"Yes, but you have not told me how long."

"Then listen."

"I am listening with the utmost eagerness."

"Last night, then, at nine o'clock, or it may, perhaps, have been a few moments later, I was in Drury Lane, so that I have managed to come thus far in ten hours less five minutes."

Captain Hawk sat on his horse and looked at Dick with as much wonderment as probably he would have done had he been assured that he was at that moment in the moon instead of upon the earth.

Dick Turpin enjoyed his astonishment immensely.

"You don't seem to believe me altogether," he said, at length, perceiving that the captain did not speak.

"You take my breath away."

"I thought it would"

"But do you mean to tell me in sober earnest that you have ridden your mare this immense distance in the space of time you mention?"

"I will swear to it if you like; but I think her condition ought to give some weight to my testimony."

"Well, well, you amaze me more than I can express. Even now I am half wondering whether I can have heard aright."

"I am not surprised at that."

"Had anyone else told me this," he continued, "I should have steadfastly refused belief. I should not have hesitated to call it a most monstrous invention."

"That does not surprise me. No doubt there will be many who will refuse to believe that such a feat has been performed. But fortunately there is abundance of proof in existence—the best of proof, I may say. But I must not linger," he added, perceiving that the captain had not yet recovered from his surprise. "I have no time to spare, for I intend to be at the Bowling Green, at York, by the time the clock in the old minster peals forth the hour of nine."

"You will hardly do it, I fear," was the earnest reply. "Still, I will not render your undertaking any more difficult by detaining you here, and yet——"

"Yet what?"

"If you would allow me to ride on a little way by your side I should look upon it as a great favour; I am loth to part with you without exchanging a few words. My way is any way if you will let me come."

To have refused this request would have been churlish to a degree, so Dick at once granted it.

Captain Hawk looked delighted.

"I am impatient," he said, as he put his splendid horse in motion—"most impatient to know what can have induced you to undertake so long a ride. You must have had some powerful reason for it, for—will you excuse me if I speak my thoughts?"

"Certainly. What would you say? Do not hesitate to speak freely."

"Well, then, I think your motive must have been powerful in the extreme, for I am perfectly certain that after this Black Bess will never be again what she has been. You must know it too; and I am at a loss to think why you are willing to sacrifice her."

Captain Hawk's words caused Dick Turpin so much emotion that for a moment or two he could not speak.

Captain Hawk rode beside him in silence, with his eyes fixed upon his countenance.

By a sudden effort Turpin cleared his voice, and then, in sad tones, he said:

"You are right, Black Bess will never, never be again what she has been."

"I regret it," answered Hawk, "for more reasons than one. I have heard much about her, and always hoped that the day would come when I should be able to try Satan against her. Now the trial will be unfair."

Alas! for poor Black Bess.

She was no match now for the captain's splendid horse, which seemed to fly over the ground and to carry his master as though he was no heavier than the air.

Dick's heart swelled.

Hitherto Black Bess had carried off the palm, but now she was compelled to yield it.

Satan could easily have gone two miles to her one.

"But you do not tell me your motive," pursued Captain Hawk, after a lengthy pause.

"It is this," was the answer, given after much effort. "The road has no longer any charms for me. I am determined to quit it. I have already levied my last contribution."

"What do I hear?" ejaculated the captain. "This is more surprising than anything yet. Surely you are not in earnest—you are joking?"

"Far from it."

"Pardon me, I can see you are sad—there is some deep trouble about your heart."

"There is indeed."

"Tell it me. Surely you may confide in me to that extent."

"Yes—yes, I have nothing to conceal. It surprises me that you have not heard already."

"No, I have heard nothing."

"Well, then, the police officers surprised us all at Stonehenge. Maud—you remember Maud?"

Dick's voice faltered here.

He could say no more.

"Remember her?" cried Captain Hawk, in a manner that showed all his interest was awakened. "Of course I do! What of her?"

"She was mortally wounded by a pistol bullet," added Dick, speaking hurriedly, "Sixteen-String Jack made prisoner, and the rest made a temporary escape with difficulty."

"Good Heavens! Mortally wounded do you say? But—but—you do not mean that—that——"

"Yes, she is dead. Listen, I will tell you all. It may interest you a little, and it will certainly relieve my heart a little, for the worst is by no means told."

"It will interest me deeply," answered Captain Hawk; "and you may make sure of having my earnest sympathy."

"I know it."

Dick Turpin then, at some length, recounted those events which have been already laid before the reader.

The captain was deeply affected when he was made acquainted with the particulars of Maud's death.

Dick's emotion almost overcame him, and well-nigh put an end to his narrative altogether.

Rallying, he went on until he described how Tom King had fallen by his hand.

"It is a most unlucky circumstance," said Captain Hawk, "and one that nobody would regret more than I shall. Still, I think you are wrong in taking the blame to yourself—it was an accident, nothing more."

"I know that," was Turpin's answer; "but that does not alter the fact that my hand is red with the blood of my best friend."

"It is sad—very—very sad, but—and I hope you will excuse my persistent curiosity—I am still in the dark as to your reasons for undertaking this long ride."

"True—I had forgotten. The fact is, I have not perhaps what you would call a motive at all. But can you understand that, after all I have related to you, I hould feel doubly anxious and determined to pursue my original course?"

"What was that?"

"Why, to leave England with as much expedition as I could, and make the best of my way to that little hamlet on the coast of France, where—where——"

"Yes—yes," interrupted Hawk, quickly, "I understand—go on."

"I feel that I would sooner end my days in peace and quiet near her grave than I would accept a crown even. But when added to all other disasters came the death of my best friend, Tom King, upon my head, I felt as though I could fly from myself—fly anywhere."

"No doubt it would affect you strongly."

"It did—more strongly by far than I can possibly express. I took the road to York without reflection—I may have done so unconsciously, because it was the intention of Tom and myself to pay a visit to that city. My foes came hard and fast upon my track; I distanced them at first without trouble—the ease with which I did so, and the freedom of my mare's movements, first caused me to conceive the idea of riding to York. I—I fancy I must have been somewhat excited then. Looking back, I don't think I should have taken such a resolution in a moment of calmness."

"I should think not, either."

"My idea was," continued Turpin, speaking with greater animation than before—"my idea was that, as we had made together some little stir in the world, we ought not to drop out of it obscurely. I was conscious that if we fled thus secretly, we should both be speedily forgotten. I was desirous, however, that Black Bess at least should be remembered by posterity, and spoken of as the steed that should eclipse all others. That made me think of riding her to York. The resolution was soon taken, for I believed the task to be within her powers. I fear now I have overrated them, but even if so we will do it yet—York now is close at hand."

CHAPTER MCI.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN LOSES HIS LAST REMAINING FRIEND.

DICK TURPIN pronounced these words with a fervour strikingly at variance with his former dejection.

His eyes sparkled, and a feeble flush of colour suffused both his cheeks.

But Captain Hawk's attention was just then diverted.

He was listening.

His companion, however, was too much taken up with the prospect which the accomplishment of his purpose afforded him to notice it.

"Dick," Captain Hawk exclaimed, "we have not been making such good speed as your pursuers; I can hear them now behind us."

As a matter of course, these words aroused Dick at once.

During the somewhat lengthy conversation that had taken place they had by no means been standing still.

On the contrary, they had made good speed, and yet had not been going so fast as to render the keeping up of a conversation a very difficult matter.

Dick found that Captain Hawk was not mistaken.

He could distinguish the faint clatter of hoofs in the rear.

"I must be pushing on," he exclaimed "They have got another lot of fresh horses, I suppose, and you may judge I shall have a little trouble in preserving my distance from them."

"I had hoped," said Captain Hawk, "to have had a trial of speed between Satan here and your mare, but the odds now are quite unequal."

"Yes, it would not be fair," said Turpin. And it is probable that he never regretted having brought his mare to this condition as he did now.

"If you will let me, though," added Captain Hawk, "I will gallop a little way with you. Not for the sake of making any trial of speed—for that would be manifestly absurd—but because I should like to keep you company for a little longer."

"With all my heart. Come on!"

Both horses now were put upon their mettle.

It was easy to perceive that Captain Hawk's horse Satan was a stimulus of no ordinary character to Black Bess.

She was, although so weary, yet full of fire and impatience to pass the stranger.

But the effort, though gallantly made, proved unsuccessful.

Satan kept the lead easily, and yet his rider was keeping him comparatively tight in hand.

Yet, as we have said, the emulation excited caused Black Bess to gallop for several miles at a speed which she would not otherwise have attained.

But all at once Captain Hawk pulled up.

There was nothing that Dick could see to cause him to do so, and therefore he looked towards him somewhat curiously.

"Dear me," he ejaculated, "you are going to York, and I have only just this moment thought of something which I ought to have told you at first."

"Indeed! what is it?"

"The sight of you put it quite out of my head. When you first saw me I was riding rather swiftly, was I not?"

"You were, indeed."

"Well, then, it is now my turn to be confidential, though, as there is little time, I cannot enter into particulars. However, I have had an adventure in the good old city of York which has caused such a hue and cry after me as has never been heard of before. The officers were in full pursuit of me, and though I had got so well ahead of them I should not wonder if they are not still upon the road."

"What makes you think so?"

"Because they are a party of London officers who were sent to York upon some business or other, and they are upon their return journey."

"This is awkward."

"Very awkward. I take great blame to myself for not having thought about it sooner. However, there is time, for as yet there is no mischief done."

"But I fancy I shall find myself most unpleasantly between two troops of my foes unless I quit the highway, which for many reasons I am unwilling to do; and even if I did," he added, "there is no certainty that I should avoid this second troop."

"Believe me," exclaimed Captain Hawk, "I am sorry, deeply sorry that I should thus have increased your perplexity. But, however, as I got you into the difficulty so will I get you out of it."

"But how?"

"Never mind how. Let it be sufficient for you that I shall do it."

"But it is not sufficient for me," said Turpin, warmly; "I insist upon knowing what it is you intend to do!"

"Why, get you out of your difficulty. Have I not said so?"

"True, you have said that; but I want to know what means you are going to adopt."

"Perhaps you will object to them."

"I shall if it involves you in any danger in attempting to extricate me."

"Now I will tell you what I am going to do," said Captain Hawk; "but I warn you beforehand that I shall take no notice of any objections you may raise, but shall adhere to my purpose."

"Will you tell me what it is?" asked Turpin, impatiently. "I can already hear the hoofs of this second troop you speak of."

"Can you so? Then my purpose will be quickly carried out, and you shall have the high-road quite free before you."

Dick Turpin was full of anxiety to know what it was his companion had in contemplation.

That it was something unusually adventurous, he could gather from his manner and from his unwillingness to speak concerning it.

"There is no doubt about them being on the road," cried the captain, who occupied a position a little in advance of Turpin. "And now I will tell you just what I think of doing, and you will say in a moment it is the simplest and easiest thing in the world."

"Then why use so much circumlocution about it?"

Captain Hawk smiled.

"Listen!" he said, in a deliberate tone. "I am going to gallop on now as fast as I can until I catch sight of the officers who have been in pursuit of me."

"Nay, but——"

"Hold—I will hear nothing! When I catch sight of them, it follows that they must also at that identical moment catch sight of me. Good. I shall just take my course across the country—the open fields, you know—letting them see where I go. You may calculate as a certainty that they will all join in pursuit of me once more, and consequently your road will be clear."

The way in which Captain Hawk stated these intentions was really most amusing to listen to.

Dick was amazed, and well he might be, for he would hardly have contemplated such an act himself.

"Is it not a good plan, now?" asked Hawk, with a laugh.

"It may be, but I don't intend to let you carry it out."

"Let me see you prevent me! Ha, ha! I can do as I like! There was a time when perhaps Black Bess could have kept pace with Satan, but that certainly is not at present. Farewell! I feel assured that if you go to York we shall meet again."

With these lightly-uttered words upon his lips, Captain Hawk wheeled round, loosed the reins, and gave a peculiar signal.

Satan gave a bound forward, and in less than a moment vanished round a bend in the road

To attempt pursuit Dick knew was futile, and how bitter was the pang which this knowledge caused him!

Always before he had been able to outstrip everything—now he was condemned to be a laggard.

His anger was great, and—sadly we say it—found its vent upon Black Bess.

With a savage desperation, much unlike his usual manner and totally in opposition to his treatment of his mare, he plunged both his spurs deeply into her dripping flanks.

The moment she felt the infliction of the sharp pain, a cry, which can only be described by calling it a scream of agony, burst from the lips of Black Bess.

It was a terrible sound.

Dick shuddered as he heard it, and would have given worlds for the power to recall his hasty action.

But it was too late.

Snorting furiously, Black Bess broke into a mad gallop.

Hard and fast as she went, however, Dick had not the slightest chance of coming up with Captain Hawk.

Still he kept a sharp look-out.

At length he exclaimed:

"He has been as good as his word, I see. There he goes, the officers after him. He has rendered me a good service, beyond all doubt," he continued, as he noted how strongly his foes mustered; "but yet the peril to himself is immense. It is certain that he has more valour, or rather recklessness, than discretion."

About the last part of Dick's speech there could scarcely be a doubt.

True to his expressed purpose, the captain had shown himself to his pursuers, and then led them off across the country.

They had snapped at the bait greedily enough, and so missed the prize they might have gained had they remained.

What made Captain Hawk's feat still more daring, was the circumstance of its being broad daylight, so that there would be little difficulty in keeping him in view.

Not one man in ten thousand would have thought of doing such a thing, but the captain was no ordinary individual, as the reader may yet learn, for it may be we shall hear something more of him.

That his boldness proceeded from the absolute reliance he placed in the speed his horse was able to make, is certain, yet many of his actions only seemed like tempting fate.

It was, however, a source of great satisfaction to Dick Turpin to observe that he kept ahead of his followers bravely; and unless some unforeseen ccident should occur, he would doubtless altogether outdistance them in a little time.

At present, though, it is with Dick Turpin we have to do, not with Captain Hawk.

As soon as his attention was recalled from the chase he noted with a keen throb of anguish how terrible was the condition of his poor steed.

Her panting alone was dreadful to listen to; and then her head, no longer carried proudly by her nobly arching neck, hung down almost to the ground.

Round drops of moisture, looking more like tears than aught else, slowly trickled down her cheeks.

Her eyes protruded dreadfully, while her tongue lobbed out of her foam-flecked mouth.

Dick groaned.

"And so at last, my bonny Black Bess," he said, in a bitter voice, "I have been brute enough to bring you to this. Had I been told, I would never have believed that I should have lived to see this. Fool—fool that I have been to allow a foolish prideful feeling—a yearning after empty fame—to bring you down to this! Fame—fame! What is fame in return for the loss of you, my own brave, true Black Bess?"

There were tears of genuine sorrow in Turpin's eyes as he thus spoke.

But he felt that such a manifestation of feeling was unworthy of him—that it betrayed weakness—and so he subdued it.

The rapidity with which he shook off this sad reflection was wonderful.

"There is no help for it," he said—"we cannot undo the past. But we can make the best possible use of the present and the future, and that I will strive my best to do. Repinings are quite useless, so I will give way to them no longer."

Black Bess was standing now.

She was quivering in every limb, and seemed incapable of travelling half a mile further.

"I have killed her," murmured Dick, in tones of the most poignant anguish—"I have killed her!"

Just then he happened to look across the road, and on a stone which he had not previously noticed, he read the words:—

"TO YORKE, XVIII MILES."

"No more than that," he murmured—"no more than that, and a full hour to do it in? And yet I fear it might as well have been a hundred as eighteen—one is not a whit more possible than the other. And then to think that only yesterday she would have thought nothing of it. Now, to-day, what is she?"

Again Dick paused.

He was compelled to do so, for he was completely overcome.

But presently he spoke again:

"How hard—how vexatious a thing it is to fail—and to fail, too, at a moment when the much-wished-for end seemed graspable! I might as well now have never made the attempt. It will be said now that the boasted powers of Black Bess were overrated, or rather overtasked—that something was found which it was thought she could perform, but which turned out a failure. No—no. As I live, it shall never be!"

He brought down his clenched fist with great violence as he made the determination.

Yet, what use was there in it?

What could he do?

Suddenly a thought struck him.

His fingers wandered towards the pocket of his vest

He recollected the potion given him by the friendly ostler.

He drew forth the bottle and held it up towards the light.

"What latent properties can this drug have to produce so great an effect? Is it real or is it all a delusion? But above all, shall I try it? That is the question."

The repugnance he had felt to administer the drug had not much abated.

But he was undecided.

In that state a little would prove sufficient to determine him one way or other.

This something came in the shape of the hoofbeats of his indefatigable pursuers.

"I am like a gamester with a last stake," he exclaimed. "It is my only chance. I will try it—I will try it. Black Bess cannot be made much worse than she is——"

Here a swelling in the throat prevented him from finishing what he was about to say.

But he soon continued.

"It may be that this will enable us to accomplish our nearly-over purpose, and if so, ought I to hesitate any longer? No—no, I will not! I will run the risk."

He dismounted as he spoke.

"It may be that it will cause you to gallop on till you fall down dead beneath me; but then we shall, perhaps, be so many miles nearer to York; and then, perhaps, after all, she might have a worse end. Better to die serving me, than to drag out a long but painful existence. No—no, Bess, I cannot bear the thought of losing you. It does not seem as though the day could ever come when we must part for ever."

While thus easing his breast by giving utterance to his reflections, his fingers were busily at work removing bit and bridle.

This was soon done, and the latter free from the foam-covered mass around it.

The bottle now was ready.

He uncorked it.

Yet he held it between his thumb and fingers reluctantly still.

"You may lose me soon," he cried, addressing her; "and when you have—— Bah! this is childish! But I may be picked off by a bullet, or—or—— What am I talking of? Yet every now and then there comes over me the consciousness that my end is drawing near—that my race is nearly run. Nonsense—nonsense! At any rate, Bess," he concluded, "I would rather see you die beneath me than be obliged to leave you to the mercies of other people. About that I have no sort of doubt. I should be better content if I knew the end of you."

So saying, Dick Turpin raised his hand with the air of a man who has taken a desperate resolution, but who is compelled to be hasty in carrying it out lest his heart should fail him.

A moment afterwards the drug was poured down the throat of Black Bess.

Dick cast the empty bottle from him.

Then, standing still, he watched to see whether any alteration was perceptible.

He had not long to wait.

Whatever the components of that drug might be, they must have had when aggregated a marvellous power, for as he gazed, Dick could plainly perceive his mare draw herself together, so to speak, and to stand more as was her wont.

Once more—and a pang rent her master's heart as the reflection crossed him that it might be for the last time—once more her neck arched, her eyes brightened, and her fore-foot pawed the ground.

"Wonderful—wonderful!" ejaculated Turpin. "This surpasses all belief. If its effects will only endure for the space of one short hour I shall care not—our purpose will be achieved."

He was so intent in watching Black Bess, and congratulating himself upon the fact that he should not have to suffer the mortification of failure, that he completely forgot all about his foes.

But he was soon reminded of them by hearing the loud clatter of their approaching horses.

Well-nigh worn out as he was, Dick yet bent a defiant gaze upon them.

Then mounting, he waved his hat as though daring them to the pursuit, and once more gave Black Bess the impulse forward.

The administered drug had now had time to work its full results, and under the influence of it the gallant mare again broke into a gallop.

It could not be expected, however, that this should be anything like equal to her ordinary mode of going, yet it answered Dick's purpose.

Once more the hedgerows, now glistening with dew-drops in the early morning sun, flew past him.

Once more the milestones rapidly succeeded one another.

Once more Dick's spirits rose to their highest pitch.

His foes, too, had dropped off to less than half their former number.

Neither flesh, blood, nor the seats of their smallclothes could withstand the never-ceasing friction of the saddle, and one by one they had dropped off from sheer inability to sit any longer.

Skellum suffered no slight inconvenience from this cause, for scarcely any rider, however well practised, could keep the saddle for so many hours unintermittedly without feeling the disagreeable consequences of it.

But Mr. Skellum's fierce and dogged nature would not have permitted him to succumb to a much greater evil than this, and so he kept on, encouraging by his example those men to follow him who would otherwise have fallen off.

Moreover, he pointed out to those who remained that if they finally succeeded, as he felt assured they must, the fewer that were in at the death the greater would be the share of the reward that each would receive, those who had discontinued the chase not being entitled to anything for their exertions.

This, of course, was a great inducement.

"Never mind the pain," Skellum concluded; "grin and bear it. Stick to your work like men, and the money will prove an excellent healing plaster."

With renewed hope and spirits the men continued the chase, for they had too palpably seen how distressed Black Bess was to have any doubts about their speedy success, provided they could continue to hold out a little longer.

In the meanwhile Dick Turpin found Black Bess tearing over the ground in a manner he had little anticipated.

Indeed, he found it difficult to credit the evidence of his own senses.

The first ten miles were accomplished with apparently little effort.

No stronger proof than this could be brought forward of the surprising efficacy of the ostler's potion.

"Eight miles!"

The words were uttered by Dick Turpin with an exultant shout that so amazed a man ploughing in an adjacent field that he stopped his team at once, and stood gazing in dull wonderment after the flying horseman.

Eight miles!

To Dick this distance seemed as nothing.

Every moment he expected to catch sight of his destination.

"It will be done," he cried—"done easily. Bravo, Bess! it is a feat that will never be forgotten—one that will perpetuate your name for ever. Eight miles! On—on, gallant steed! Rest and peace are now before you—on—on——"

But at this moment the gallant creature stumbled.

Dick snatched the rein suddenly, and she continued as before.

But, nevertheless, the occurrence made the highwayman's heart sink like lead.

All his exultation was gone.

Anxiety and dismay took its place.

The drug was losing its potent, subtle influence.

Never had his mare stumbled so before, and he was conscious that but for the stimulus of the drug she would long since have dropped down insensible or dead.

And this was what he now dreaded.

For all that, he could tell the effects would evaporate as speedily as they were produced.

If so, he had to dread her downfall every moment, and, if so, what was to be done?

The police officers were not in sight just then, but if he lingered they soon would be.

These reflections passed very rapidly through his mind, and yet, short as was the time, Bess stumbled again.

And on this occasion, too, it was a stumble of a much worse character.

With infinite difficulty she kept her legs, and, as if full of anger at the manifestation of such a symptom of weakness, tried most desperately to gallop on as before.

But the effort was a vain one.

Dick felt her reel beneath him.

She swayed fearfully from side to side.

Still she kept on.

Dick Turpin let her go at her own will

He felt that it was his only chance.

His thoughts now were of such a character as altogether to defy any attempt at description.

As for Bess, she bounded on, it is true; but more with the fashion of a galvanised automaton than a real living creature.

Dick sat upon her back in a stupor of despair.

At every moment he expected to see her fall, but to his astonishment she still kept on.

In the distance he saw a milestone.

Would she reach it?

Yes, it is reached and passed.

Dick, looking intently, sees upon it the figure 3.

He cannot read, but he knows that represents the number of miles intervening between that spot and York.

"Good Heavens!" he ejaculated. "Can it be possible that, after all, we are to fail—to fail now that we are so close to our destination? Ah!" he exclaimed, as a turn in the roadway enabled him to see some distance in advance—"ah, there is York!

"Look—look, Bess," he exclaimed, addressing himself to his all but worn-out steed—"look, Bess, there is the point I wish so much to reach: there—there is York! Courage—courage! We shall do it yet, old girl—I feel assured we shall—do it, too, within the time! Courage—courage! We are almost there!"

As before, her master's voice induced Black Bess to increase her efforts.

But it was a fatal attempt.

Again she stumbled.

This time her knees fairly touched the ground.

But, with a snort, she recovered her upright position.

She trembled, though, in every limb.

She struggled on a little way, swaying fearfully the while from side to side.

Even at this, the last gasp, her courage was indomitable.

She would not give in, but strung up every nerve and sinew for a final effort.

Dick knew not what to do, and so sat in the saddle like one stupified.

He was certain his mare was going.

Still, to his astonishment, she staggered on.

Then, finally, as though by sheer desperation, broke into a gallop.

But it did not last out half a dozen yards.

All at once—without any preparation save a slight tremor of all her limbs—she went down.

[THE BLOODHOUNDS ARE LET LOOSE UPON DICK TURPIN'S TRACK.]

Went down like some animal suddenly struck down at the shambles.

Although in one sense Dick Turpin was prepared for this occurrence, yet, nevertheless, he was taken by surprise.

So instantaneous was the fall, and so little expected at that precise juncture, that he could not save himself.

He tried, but the attempt was a failure.

Almost as if he had been projected from some piece of ordnance, he shot over his mare's neck.

He came down heavily in the roadway upon his head, and such was the impetus that he rolled over and over in the dust for several yards.

There he remained for some moments quite insensible.

A painful sensation in his chest, as though it was pressed upon by some heavy weight, was the next thing of which he was conscious.

Slowly he raised his head, too confused at present to comprehend the exact nature of his position, and to recollect with anything like clearness what had last occurred.

But remembrance soon came back.

He had only to look a little way down the roadway.

There was a sight to be seen there which he could scarcely gaze upon without being heartbroken.

Lying at full length on her side—her flanks rising and falling with a convulsive motion, her neck and head stretched out till they formed nearly a straight line, her eyes glassy and dim, her mouth wide open with the lips retracted, her tongue protruded and half cut in two by the sharp steel bit, her whole body reeking—was poor Black Bess!

She had taken her last gallop—her race was run.

She had perished in the effort to serve her master.

No. 241. Price One Halfpenny.

No. 242 will be Published next Thursday.

CHAPTER MCII.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN SHOWS HIMSELF TO BE AS GOOD AS HIS WORD.

Yes, all was over.

Poor Black Bess had approved her fidelity with her death.

She had served her master too well—that master who should have given her more consideration.

Yet there was nothing of reproach in the way in which she raised her head, with a painful and languid movement, and looked after her master.

Slowly and painfully, Dick rose to his feet.

It was not so much pain in his limbs, however, as it was the dead weight about his heart which kept him down.

Remorse, deep and bitter, had seized upon him.

He approached with a hesitating, undecided step.

The aspect of poor Black Bess stretched almost lifeless upon the roadway, struck more daggers in his heart than could the most acrimonious of reproaches.

As he advanced, he bent his head down towards the ground.

Bess neighed faintly.

Dick responded by a heavy groan.

The next moment he stood beside her.

Then, with a loud cry of grief and despair, which would much have amazed anyone who had chanced to hear it, he flung himself wildly on his knees.

His faithful mare raised her head still more, and made an ineffectual attempt to rise.

But her master clasped his arms tightly round her neck and pressed her head to his breast.

"My poor, poor Bess!" he cried. "And has it come to this? Is this the end? Now that the worst has happened, I can scarcely believe but that I have been made the sport of some terrible delusion! I am like one in a dream."

Another sob at this moment choked his utterance.

He stroked his mare's neck a few times, and then continued, half aloud:

"Can it be that you have run your last race—that you have sacrificed yourself for your unworthy master? Yes—yes, hard and terrible as belief is, I can hold out against it no longer! You are dying, Bess: yes—yes, surely and swiftly dying! I can see it in your dimming eyes! Alas—alas! Dying, and for what?"

He paused, for just then his ear caught the sound of bells.

He listened intently,

It was a clock striking.

It was the chiming of the four quarters which had first attracted his attention.

Then, after that, he counted, one by one, several distinct booming sounds, telling the hour.

There were nine of them.

As the last reached his ears, his face assumed an air of animation which afforded a striking contrast to his former gloom.

"I am answered," he ejaculated, as the last of the ringing sounds died away—"I am answered! It was that—it was to hear those chimes! The feat is achieved, Bess! We are at York, for those were the bells in the old Minster that I heard. The journey has been performed within the time! It has cost you your life, my gallant Bess; but I can spare it. You might have lived longer, but it would have been to die perhaps ignobly. And what gallant action has ever yet been achieved that has not involved some great sacrifice or other? The sacrifice this time has been your life!"

This last reflection reconciled Dick in some slight degree to that loss which, however much he might deplore it, was inevitable.

For his own part, he felt that he should no longer have occasion for his mare's services, and therefore it is not surprising that he should prefer to see her lying stiff and stark before him than for her to fall into other hands.

His mind once more reverted to that peaceful village near the sea-shore, and a stronger inclination than ever sprung up in his mind to hasten there.

He was aroused from these meditations by feeling his mare's head slip out of his embrace.

A moment afterwards there was a convulsive shuddering of her whole body.

Her ribs expanded, and so great was the force within that the saddle-girths were snapped asunder.

Then ensued a long and heavily-exhaled breath.

It was her last!

There was a slight movement of the muscles.

Then all was still.

Black Bess—the highwayman's stanch, invaluable friend—the incomparable steed, whether for qualities of beauty, shape, fleetness, or endurance, for she possessed them all in the highest degree—Black Bess was dead!

When Dick Turpin realised that the mysterious essence called life had departed—that nothing remained of his priceless steed but a mass of senseless flesh, his grief burst out afresh, and continued for some time without intermission.

But at last it wore itself away, as every violent emotion will—perhaps all the sooner in his case because of the danger with which he was threatened, and the difficulties he had to contend against.

Moreover, he recollected that his purpose was not altogether carried out, and he renewed his determination to complete it.

The question, too, arose as to what he should do with the body of his mare.

To leave it in the highway, subject to all manner of indignities, was a thing to which he could not bring his mind at all.

And yet, how was he to dispose of it?

He looked around him almost despairingly, but in a moment afterwards his features altered in expression.

This was because he perceived on one side of him a rather high stone wall—such a one as would form a boundary to some nobleman's estate—which was pierced by a light iron gate.

At the first glance Dick saw that this gate was only fastened by means of an iron latch.

This he raised, and pushed the gate wide open.

Then, by dint of putting forth all the strength which he possessed, he dragged Black Bess across the road towards it.

It was a toilsome operation, and, but for the intense disinclination he felt to leaving her on the highway, he would have abandoned his undertaking in despair.

Moreover, the reader must have been struck by the fact that it would be of the highest importance to conceal the body of Black Bess from his pursuers.

Dick wanted, if possible, to keep them ignorant of the fact that he was afoot.

This helped to make him persevere in his intention.

Nearer and nearer his load was dragged, until at length he passed through the gate.

Then he paused a little while to rest, for the exertion was almost too much for him in his present wearied state.

The success which had attended his endeavours so far would naturally have the effect of stimulating him to a still greater degree.

His rest, therefore, was a short one.

But it took nearly the whole of his remaining strength to drag Black Bess where he desired to place her.

This was close under the stone wall of which we have spoken.

His foes were too close behind him for him to have the time to dig a grave, though this was what he would have preferred to do.

Besides, he was unprovided with the requisite implements.

This, then, was perforce abandoned, but he did the next best thing in his power.

Close at hand was a great quantity of newly-fallen leaves—in some places they were quite knee-deep.

With these he covered her over, and so well did he work that in less than ten minutes nothing could be seen of her but a huge bed of leaves.

"It grieves me, Bess," he had said, as he covered up the last visible remnant of her body, "to think that I can give you no better burial. But yet you will rest here as well as in a gorgeous tomb. I may, too, have the opportunity of placing you beneath the turf. We shall see—we shall see!"

He paused in saddened thought.

His reverie might have lasted some time had not his quick ears caught the sound of a horseman approaching.

"What am I to do next?" he asked, arousing himself. "I feel like a vessel without a rudder or a helmsman. What am I to do?"

He walked a few paces nearer to the little iron gate.

"Let me think," he continued. "I undertook to be at the Bowling Green this morning at nine o'clock. In that respect, at any rate, I shall fail, for it is past nine already. Yet I will be as good as my word, even though I am a little late—I will go on to York."

Having come to this determination, he stepped out into the high-road.

The sound of a horse's hoofs could now be heard very plainly indeed, and, glancing in the direction of the sound, he perceived a mounted traveller approaching.

He was coming from York.

At the first glance Dick took a resolution.

He shrank back through the gateway, and, drawing forth one of his pistols, examined it attentively.

It required a little attention to the priming, and by the time this had been put right the horseman was very close at hand indeed.

But Dick was ready.

Choosing the proper moment, he suddenly emerged and placed himself exactly in the centre of the highway.

The gentleman's horse, frightened at his sudden appearance and firm demeanour, brought itself to a standstill with so much abruptness that it rose on its haunches, while its fore legs pawed the air.

Dick was ready as he came down again to seize the rein, which he held with a grasp of iron.

No one could possibly have been more amazed than was this gentleman Dick had so unceremoniously dealt with.

To be stopped thus within a couple of miles of old York City, and by broad daylight, too, seemed beyond the pale of all belief.

But Dick Turpin's first words convinced him that it was a reality.

"Dismount," he said, in the short sharp tones of one accustomed to military command—"dismount!"

"What for?"

"Because I want your horse."

"Well, of all the d—d impudence——"

"Hold—hold, I have no time to waste in words. I want your horse, and, take my word for it, the wisest thing you can do is to submit quietly, for I am not in the humour to put up with any trifling."

"Well, but——"

"Dismount, I tell you! I want your horse!"

"But I decline."

"Then I shall be obliged to have recourse to force. Do you see this pistol? It is loaded, and I looked to the priming not a moment ago. If you don't alight I shall use it to compel you."

"But, my good fellow, I am bound on business of the utmost importance. I assure you it will not brook a moment's delay——"

"I can't help that! Your horse I must and will have!"

"But do you think I will tamely submit to lose my property in this fashion?"

"You will not lose it."

"Not lose it?" echoed the traveller, with an incredulous air.

"Certainly not. I am in haste to reach York; and if you will lend me your horse for that purpose I will either leave it for you at your house or in any part of York you like to name."

"That sounds very like a whale, does it not?"

"Never mind, I will parley no longer. Your steed you will have to surrender, and it is for you to choose whether you will do so with or without the sacrifice of your life."

Dick's resolute air was not to be doubted, and the traveller had sense enough to see that he would at all risks be as good as his word.

Accordingly, he quitted the saddle, though the manner in which he did so showed how much this act went against the grain.

Dick was mounted in a moment.

"Understand me," he said, "yours will be no loss. I am going to the Bowling Green, and there I will leave your horse. You can have it again in half an hour's time if you think fit."

The traveller, who happened to be a very respectable attorney in the City of York, was still incredulous.

Dick Turpin, however, gave him time to say no more, but turning the horse's head, used the spurs vigorously, and dashed off at a gallop.

The attorney looked after him as long as he was in sight, and then murmured, with a rueful air:

"People will call me a fool for giving up my horse so easily; but what the devil could I do? I only hope the rascal will be as good as his word; but I doubt it—I doubt it."

The lawyer stood a moment or two in deep thought, as though endeavouring to come to a decision whether it would be better for him to retrace his steps or continue on his journey.

The trampling of hoofs aroused him, and looking along the road, he caught sight of Mr. Skellum and the remnant of his party.

Both horses and riders seemed to be in the last stage of exhaustion and distress.

Their half immersion in the river had by no means improved the appearance of the officers, and they were moreover covered thickly with dust and the foam from the mouths of their jaded steeds.

Their whole aspect indeed was such as to attract the attention of the most careless observer.

The York attorney was filled with astonishment and curiosity.

Perceiving him, Mr. Skellum drew rein in order to make a few inquiries, for some time had elapsed since he had last seen anyone upon the road.

"Good morning," he said, raising himself in the stirrups, for in the present condition of his skin, anything was preferable to sitting. "Have you seen anything of a red-coated fellow on a black horse?"

"No, I have not."

"You have not?" gasped Mr. Skellum, who was very far from anticipating this reply.

"Certainly not."

"How far have you come?"

"From my house in York?"

"And you have kept along the highway?"

"Yes."

"And you have not seen anyone answering to the description I have given?"

"What description?"

"Why, a man in a red coat, much dirtied and torn, though, and with a generally wild appearance."

"Well," said the attorney, "I have certainly seen a man who would answer to that description——"

"Yes, yes!"

"But he was not on horseback."

"Not on horseback?"

"No."

"How then?"

"On foot."

"And was he going towards York?"

"D—n him! I should think he is there by this time."

"Come—come," said Skellum, shifting himself about uneasily, "I can see you know something more of this matter. Let me know all."

"First give me a reason why I should satisfy your curiosity."

"I can easily do that. We are police officers from London, in pursuit of Dick Turpin, the highwayman."

The lawyer repeated the name.

"You have heard of him, I suppose?"

"Yes, I have heard some extraordinary and incredible tales respecting such a man."

"Well, then, I will undertake to say you never heard of anything half so extraordinary as this last feat of his. I would not have believed it, only I have been a witness to the whole."

"What is it?"

"Why, he has ridden from London to here in just twelve hours."

"Nonsense!"

"Your disbelief does not surprise me, but it is a fact, nevertheless."

"That he rode on horseback from London to York in twelve hours?"

"Yes. This time last night we were in Drury Lane, which, as you may happen to know, is near enough the centre of London."

"I know it well. And you have made the journey in the same time?"

"Yes, we have been in hot pursuit of him all the way; and though we have been furnished with relays of horses at about every twenty miles, yet we have been unable to overtake him."

"And how many horses had this highwayman?"

"How many?" ejaculated Skellum, amazed that anyone should ask such a question.

"Yes, how many?"

"Why, one, to be sure!"

It was now the attorney's turn to be amazed.

"Do you mean in sober earnestness to tell me that a man has ridden two hundred miles in twelve hours with one horse?"

"It is an incontrovertible fact. There is but one steed in the world that could have performed such a feat, and that is the highwayman's mare, Black Bess."

The attorney was scarcely able to believe yet what he had heard, and he required Mr. Skellum to repeat it.

"Well," he said, drawing a long breath, "the circumstance seems well attested. I don't know how you could have fallen into any mistake, nor is there any likelihood that you would depose to what you knew to be untrue."

"Certainly not," said Skellum. "It is small credit to us to have to acknowledge that we could not overtake him. But I admire the animal; and if I had Dick Turpin here this moment, I do believe I would let him off, provided he would give me his mare, Black Bess, in recompense. But come, sir, I have satisfied your curiosity pretty well, and have rested my horse into the bargain. But I cannot afford any more time. Tell me now what you know, for I am certain you possess information."

The attorney made no attempt at concealment.

"I feel pretty sure," he said, "that I have seen the fellow you want, but he was without his steed."

"That is strange," said Skellum. "I have not seen it. What can he have done with it?"

"I can answer that question no better than yourself."

"And you say he has gone to York?"

"Yes. I suppose you have noticed these heavy riding-boots?"

"I have, and wondered why you should choose them to walk in."

"I did not choose them for that purpose—I put them on this morning because I had a long and important journey to make on urgent business matters. I rode close to this spot, when all at once the fellow we are talking of darted into the middle of the road, seized my horse, and compelled me to dismount."

"Why did you not capture him?"

"Because he looked an ugly customer to meddle with, and I had no idea who he was. Being under fear of my life, I chose to alight. In a moment he then sprang into the saddle and galloped off towards York."

"Curse it!" said Skellum. "This is most unfortunate! I am afraid we shall lose him, after all, for doubtless yours is a good horse."

"One of the best in the county, though I say it."

"It's all up, then. We have had our trouble for nothing, for I'll wager my life he rides it till it drops."

"I am afraid so, too. And yet he led me to understand that he was going no farther than York—at least, he said his destination was the Bowling Green, and that I could have my horse there in half an hour's time if I chose to apply for it."

"Gammon!" said Skellum, as he put his finger in a very waggish way by the side of his nose—"gammon! I think I see him at it!"

"I thought it an unlikely thing myself," said the attorney, with a sigh. "D—n the fellow! I would not have parted with the horse for a hundred and fifty guineas."

"Well, we will push on to the Bowling Green now we have come so far," exclaimed Skellum, with an air of intense aggravation. "Not that I have the slightest hope of finding him now. But come on—come on!"

"I wish I could come with you," cried the attorney. "But your horses seem hardly able to carry themselves."

"Not one could stand a double burden."

"No, I can see that plainly enough. Go on—I will walk."

Mr. Skellum at once set forward, and the attorney, cursing his ill-luck, prepared to follow him on foot.

But the sound of wheels behind him caused him to turn round, and then he saw approaching at a rapid rate a light vehicle on two wheels.

It was occupied only by one person, and this turned out to be one of the attorney's intimate friends.

The vehicle was stopped at once—the attorney entered it, and began to recount his morning's adventures.

The horse harnessed to the vehicle got over the ground in a capital style.

Consequently, it was not long before the attorney passed the police officers, who were not a little annoyed to think they could not be the first to arrive at the Bowling Green.

Leaving both parties, we will follow Dick.

It need not be said that he made the best use of the horse he had so unexpectedly gained possession of.

The spires of York drew nearer and nearer, and in the space of little more than ten minutes Dick pulled up suddenly in front of the Bowling Green Inn.

At that early hour in the morning—for ten o'clock had not yet struck—it was not likely that many people would be found amusing themselves on the smooth piece of grass in front of the rustic-looking public-house.

Still, there were a few loiterers.

The landlord hurried forward as soon as he saw a horseman pull up in front of the door, and bawled loudly for the ostler.

Dick dismounted, and as he did so he said:

"This is not my horse. Place him in the stable until the gentleman calls for him. I was to have been here by nine o'clock."

"Then you are late," rejoined the host.

"What is the time?"

"Five-and-twenty to ten."

"Thanks," said Dick. "I am sorry I am more than half an hour behind time; but I have had an awkward tumble. Bring me some brandy."

Dick strolled off to one of the many wooden seats that were placed round the Bowling Green.

The landlord looked after him with a little curiosity, which is not surprising when Dick's appearance is taken into consideration.

Still, the mention he had made of an ugly tumble was almost sufficient to account for it.

The brandy was brought.

Dick drained it at a draught.

Then joined the players.

To have seen him at this moment, no one would have dreamed he was the bold highwayman with whose exploits England had rung so long.

Nor would they have thought, when seeing the smile upon his face as he entered into the spirit of the sport, that his heart was bleeding, or that he had sustained so terrible a loss.

Black Bess was the sole tie that bound him to life.

Now she had gone, what would become of him?

At this present time it seemed as though he did not care.

Perhaps it was drinking brandy while in such a heated state, and at a time when he required substantial nourishment, that produced this reckless effect upon him.

He was ready for any deed, however desperate.

He played with great skill and determination, winning every game, to the no small annoyance of those present, who by no means relished a stranger's stepping in and bearing away the bell in such a triumphant style.

There was a pause, and in the silence the Minster clock struck ten.

Dick counted the strokes aloud, in a manner so peculiar and significant as to attract the notice of all.

"So late," he exclaimed, as he threw down the bowls with which he was about to commence playing another game—"so late! I cannot stay any longer. Good morning, gentlemen!"

He tossed half-a-crown to the landlord; then, turning on his heel, he walked rapidly away, vanishing almost instantly round the corner of a street.

"That is a queer fish, any way!" exclaimed the landlord, biting the coin, in order to be sure it was of the right metal. "I wonder, now what he wants at York?"

Hardly had he pronounced the words than the sound of wheels was heard, and in an instant all eyes were turned towards the road.

The arrivals were the attorney and his friend.

Both were well known to the landlord.

"Good morning, Mr. Bridgeman," he said, addressing the former. "I thought you said last night you should be obliged to take a long journey this morning."

"And you are right," said the lawyer, alighting; "but I have come for my horse. Is it here?"

"I do believe it is your horse now I come to think of it. I fancied I had seen the animal before," said the landlord, speaking more to himself than to his interrogator.

"Is it here?" asked the attorney, in an anxious voice, for he had not ventured to think for a moment that he should ever see his much-prized steed again.

"Yes," said the landlord; "he is in the stable."

"Let me see him; I shall believe my own eyes."

This was said as though he should believe nothing else.

But at this moment the landlord's attention was again distracted.

This time the cause was no other than the arrival of Mr. Skellum and his party.

He had managed to push along at much better speed than could have been expected.

"Well," he exclaimed, as he recognised the attorney, "have you any intelligence?"

"I think the horse is here. I am just going to see."

"If it is, then, rely upon it the fellow himself is not far off."

With these words, Mr. Skellum deliberately and carefully dismounted.

Having done so, he hobbled after the attorney and the landlord, for his legs were so stiff with riding that he could scarcely make any use of them whatever.

However, he managed to reach the stable door.

"Well, sir," he asked, "is your horse here?"

"To my unbounded astonishment, he is," answered Mr. Bridgeman. "I little thought of looking on him again."

"But where's the man that brought him?"

No one knew.

Mr. Skellum gazed keenly all around, but seeing nothing suspicious, began to ask for details.

His questions were eagerly responded to.

Prepared as he was for almost anything that Dick might do, yet he, nevertheless, felt strong doubts assail him upon hearing that the highwayman had actually had the audacity to remain half an hour at the inn and the sangfroid to join in a game at bowls.

It seemed absolutely incredible, but there were too many eager witnesses around to allow him to indulge in disbelief.

It was also a matter of additional vexation to Mr Skellum that at the very last he should miss his prey by what could only be called a hair's breadth.

He had left such a short time before too—such a few minutes—that he could not have walked many hundred yards.

In this all agreed, while some added that he must have been noticed, his appearance and manners were so singular, and so calculated to attract the observation of the inhabitants of the city.

Hope once more warmed Mr. Skellum's heart.

It did more, for it infused a little vigour into those limbs which but a moment before had been so nearly lifeless.

Surely the clue was good—the scent warm.

The highwayman was on foot, in a strange city, and as he was but mortal, of course not exempt from that fatigue which must be the result of the achievement he had just performed.

Calling his men around him then, Mr. Skellum, also on foot, began a fresh search, feeling sure by what the people at the Bowling Green said that he must come up with him in a few moments.

To these persons the game of bowls had no present interest.

They chose to follow at the heels of the police officers.

Up one street and down another they sped.

What words can portray their disappointment and vexation when they found themselves unable to catch a glimpse of him.

What was more, although they questioned numberless people, not one had seen him.

This was mysterious indeed.

But had Dick Turpin melted into air he could not have vanished more completely.

Mr. Skellum and everyone else concluded he was hiding somewhere.

But the indefatigable hunter of highwaymen could continue the search no longer, for the simple reason that sheer fatigue compelled him to desist.

So thoroughly worn out that he could scarcely move a limb, he crawled back to the inn and flung himself down to take that rest which was imperative.

CHAPTER MCIII.

RELATES THE ADVENTURES OF DICK TURPIN AFTER LEAVING THE BOWLING GREEN.

THE disappearance of Dick Turpin was most extraordinary, but yet it was a fact.

How he had contrived to vanish without leaving the faintest trace behind him, no one could imagine.

But he had gone, and so speedily that no one had seen him, nor was, as we have seen, the closest search and the most diligent inquiry in the least degree availing.

How this mystery came about it is now our business to describe.

It was a return of the old bravado inherent in his nature that made Dick Turpin join in as a player in the game of bowls.

Another feeling also urged him, and that was to establish abundant evidence of the precise hour of his arrival in York city.

This done, he proceeded to look after his own safety.

He was as yet by no means tired of his life, and knew that in order to preserve it he must elude his foes, whose appearance he expected every moment to witness.

And, indeed, had the bold highwayman been ever so weary of existence he would not have been willing to permit his enemies the triumph of making him their prisoner.

Once captured, there was no mistake about what the result would be.

To think of escape would be futile, for the most extraordinary precautions would be taken for his safe keeping.

Nor was Dick in love with that ignominious death which would be the termination of his captivity.

On the contrary, he would do all he could to avoid it, for death in any other form would be preferable.

This will give the reader some idea of the state of the highwayman's mind after he quitted the Bowling Green.

Fatigued, downcast, vinously excited as he was, yet all his wits were about him, and he was wondering by what means he could effectually elude his pursuers.

At this time he found himself in a long, narrow, deserted street.

The houses on either side were of an ancient build, each having overhanging stories, after the fashion approved of by our forefathers.

Although it was a bright day, yet this old street was full of gloomy shadows.

Dick Turpin, all the time thinking busily, looked attentively at every object without perceiving anything that would assist him in his design.

He was interrupted by the sound of wheels in the distance.

As if instinctively, he felt a desire to hide himself.

A place of concealment offered itself close at hand.

This was a dark, open doorway—apparently the means by which access to the rear of the houses in the street could be obtained.

Into this dark recess he shrank, and there remained until the approaching vehicle should pass by.

So obscure was the place where he stood that it was next to an impossibility for him to be seen, especially by one whirling by in a vehicle.

But from this place Dick was able to see perfectly well who went by.

He had good cause to rejoice at his prompt obedience to the instinct of concealing himself.

As the reader may have anticipated, the vehicle was the one in which the attorney was riding in company with his friend.

Had he seen Dick he would have recognised him beyond all doubt.

Turpin drew back still further.

But the danger was over.

The light gig had passed by, and the attorney never once troubled himself to look behind.

Yet Dick remained where he was, not liking to emerge until the gig was out of sight.

This soon happened.

The opportunity had arrived.

Dick was about to emerge when, to his vexation, he saw something else approaching.

This was a huge tarpaulin-covered waggon, drawn by three horses.

The rate they were going at was certainly under three miles an hour; and by the way they walked they appeared to have an unusually heavy load behind them.

The hope that after this was gone he should have the street to himself made him resolve to linger.

But the time consumed by the approach of the heavy waggon seemed endless.

The driver, Dick noted, was perched up on a high seat holding the reins, and, according to the custom of waggoners in general, his eyes were fast shut—probably he was sleeping.

These may seem trifling things to notice, but then in the state Dick was, every object, no matter how apparently trivial, had for him the strongest interest.

He afterwards had reason to congratulate himself upon having observed so narrowly.

As the waggon passed by, of course he had a view of the end of it.

He then became aware that it was loaded with sacks of grain, although two flapping sheets of canvas partially covered them.

At this moment he was struck by an idea.

He did not wait to consider of it, but proceeded to put it into execution almost as soon as he had conceived it.

Darting swiftly from his place of concealment, he ran to the end of the waggon, seized hold of a rope that was dangling from the top, and with great agility and swiftness swung himself on to the top of the sacks.

Then without loss of time he crawled further in and laid himself down at full length.

So swiftly did all this take place that it amazed even himself, so short was the time elapsing between the thought and the act.

He believed, too, that no one had observed the action.

Most certainly the somnolent driver of the waggon knew nothing of the matter.

But had not Dick acted so much upon impulse, reflection would have suggested to him that it was somewhat important he should know where the vehicle was going.

Of this he was in entire ignorance; but as the step was taken, the best thing he could do was to remain still and await the result.

He was startled from his reflections by the sound of horses' feet.

Then, almost immediately after he heard a voice cry, in stentorian tones:

"Hullo there—hullo, I say!"

"Waur-whoop!" bawled the waggoner, waking up with a start.

His team at once came to a standstill.

Then the horses' feet stopped also.

Could they be Dick's foes?

The highwayman rolled over noiselessly on the sacks, and crept a little nearer to the front.

"Which is the way to the Bowling Green?" asked a voice.

"Doan't yow know?"

"Of course not, or I should not ask."

"Why, it's just at the top of the street yonder; yow'll see it when you get a little further."

"Then you have just come from there?"

"No, I hanna; but I passed it not long since."

"Ha! that's the same thing. Have you seen anything of a man in a dirty red coat?"

"Dirty red coat?"

"Yes."

"No, I hanna."

"I don't suppose he has. He would be coming along with his eyes shut, without seeing anything."

"And if I wor, what's that to you?"

"Oh, nothing!"

"Very well, then, hold your row."

"Only," said Mr. Skellum—for it was that individual and his troop of men—"if you do see him, lay hold of him and keep him. There is a thousand pounds reward offered for him!"

At first, Dick had been not a little startled at finding the waggon stopped by his enemies; but, recovering himself, he crawled still nearer towards a fold of the canvas top, through which he hoped to be able to catch a sight of the men who had kept so indefatigably upon his track.

He saw them plainly enough in all conscience, for they were not above a yard from him.

While Skellum was speaking to the waggoner in the way we have recorded, he little thought that the eyes of the man he so much wanted to capture were fixed intently upon him—that he was, indeed, within his reach, had he but stretched out his arm to its full length.

Nothing, however, could have been further from the thoughts of Mr. Skellum and his party than that Dick was there.

A few more words passed between him and the waggoner.

Then he trotted off.

With no little difficulty, the waggoner then got his team into motion again.

As for Dick, emboldened by what had just occurred, he actually had the audacity to creep to the end of the waggon and look after his foes.

He could see them plainly enough, though it would have required a much keener vision than they possessed for them to discover him.

The next consideration which presented itself to Dick was rather an anxious one.

This was as to the destination of the waggoner.

If he was about to deliver his load to some place in the city it would be very awkward indeed for Dick, because his discovery would be inevitable; and his presence there unknown to the driver, and his soiled, travel-stained appearance would be certain to excite suspicion.

Moreover, Dick knew as well as could be that Mr. Skellum, on reaching the Bowling Green, would learn how very recently the object of his pursuit had quitted it, and would therefore institute a strict search immediately.

In a quiet place like York, news of this description would doubtless spread with amazing rapidity; and if an hour elapsed before the waggon stopped, he would, ten to one, be recognised.

This consideration was enough to cause Dick a great deal of anxiety, for never in all his life had he been so desirous or determined to get out of the clutches of the police officers.

Then, he was quite a stranger in York; and as the waggon traversed street after street, he was unable to form any idea as to whether he was being taken towards the open country or not.

Amid all this anxiety, he found his recumbent position on the sacks of grain a very comfortable one, for, after what he had gone through, he felt it no ordinary relief to stretch his limbs out at full length and remain perfectly still.

Thus he awaited the course of events.

At last he began to perceive indications that they were approaching the outskirts of the city, and finally he saw that the horses had entered upon a long, broad highroad.

Having made this discovery, he felt tolerably at his ease.

His enemies could have no clue to his whereabouts, and he indulged in the strong hope that, after having brought them so many miles in quest of him, he should be able to shake them off entirely.

To do so would be to have something like revenge upon them.

He resolved that no effort or ingenuity upon his part should be wanting.

But, standing quite alone in all the world as he now did—without comrades, without Maud, without Black Bess as well—it may seem strange that he should cling to life.

One would have thought that, on the contrary, he would have found life insupportable.

There was, in good truth, an aching void in his heart, but he clung to life because he had a purpose to accomplish.

There was an object before him upon which his mind was ever fixed.

There was a constant yearning of his spirit.

Always in his mind's eye he could see the scenery around Maud's last resting-place.

His throat would swell and ache when he thought of her, but his fixed determination was to get to the coast, embark in a vessel, and make his way to the little French village.

So paramount was his determination that all things bowed beneath it.

In times past it was rarely that he fixed his mind upon any object without securing it, and it remains to be seen whether his former success had or had not deserted him.

He last remembered being busy with these thoughts, and then all at once he was sensible of some kind of jerk.

For full a moment his brain was in confusion.

After that it seemed tolerably certain that he had unconsciously fallen off into a sleep, which might have endured much longer had it not been for the stopping of the waggon.

His sleep, too, must have been a long one, for, to his astonishment, he found that it was now almost dark.

Luckily, his presence of mind was great enough to enable him to remain perfectly still.

He could hear voices around him, and was very curious to know where he could be.

Had he reached the end of his journey?

If so, the waggon would be unloaded, and how was he to escape discovery?

He reconnoitred.

His first discovery was that the waggon had been drawn into a yard at the side of an inn.

The waggoner, assisted by an ostler, was unharnessing the horses.

"This is some halting-place," he muttered—"his journey is not over yet. What shall I do next?"

At present he was pretty well occupied in watching the movements of the men.

It was quite possible that the waggoner might take it into his head to peep inside his waggon to see whether all was right, and if he did, an alarm would immediately ensue.

At that lonely spot, and so far from York, it was questionable whether he would be recognised; but then Dick's wish was not to leave any sort of clue whatever behind him.

The two men led the horses into the stable, and Dick speedily took steps to prevent himself from being seen.

There was no one visible, and so with all possible alacrity and noiselessness he alighted.

When he set foot to earth he did not pause, but turned suddenly the angle of some building and walked on.

What should be his next step?

He was tolerably well provided with money for immediate use, and once thought of walking towards the inn and remaining there.

But a second thought induced him to abandon this intention.

He was not far enough from York to render it safe to show himself; besides, he had come altogether by the high-road, so that it would be easy to follow him so far.

Above all, after the description given by Skellum, the waggoner might recognise him.

A better course he imagined would be to make his way on foot across the country.

With this intention he crossed a stile and walked rapidly along a footpath leading across the fields.

Almost at every step he went the obscurity increased.

"I ought to make good use of the night," he said to himself. "Such darkness as this is the most effectual cover for my flight. I will try to keep on till daylight, and then I will avail myself of the first place of shelter that offers."

But in coming to this decision he quite overlooked his present exhausted state.

The ride in the waggon had rested him a great deal, it is true, but he wanted a better repose than that.

Before he had walked far he felt a dreadful feeling of weariness come over him, and, strive as he would, he could not shake it off.

He tried bravely, and walked on with great resolution, but fatigue asserted itself to be his master.

He was obliged to succumb to it.

He would do no more, however, than fling himself on the ground for a brief space.

Then rising, he went on.

But he began to think this unusual exhaustion was attributable more to the length of time he had gone without partaking of food than any other cause.

Yet in the lonely, desolate situation where he now found himself, where was he to find refreshment?

But the hope of shortly finding some solitary dwelling infused a transitory vigour into his limbs.

It was only transitory, however, for it was not long before he found himself utterly incapable of going any further.

By this time the moon had risen, and although she had not attained any considerable elevation above the horizon, yet he was able to see a little about him.

His eyes had been for some time fixed upon a dark mass in front of him, which he now made out to be a building of some kind.

Hope whispered to his heart that it might be a cottage, the inhabitants of which would afford him the food and shelter of which he stood so much in need.

But there was no ray of light to be perceived to lend any colour to this anticipation.

On the contrary, the building appeared to be lonely, solitary, deserted.

Still, whatever its character might be, it promised to afford the fugitive a better shelter than the bare sky.

Accordingly, he slowly dragged his weary limbs towards it.

As he drew nearer and became able to see it with more distinctness, hope died away within him.

It became evident that the building was merely a barn, or some such place.

Yet its roof promised some shelter, and he held on his course.

But when at last he reached the building, Dick felt that had it been much further off he must have abandoned the thought of gaining it.

As it was, a fresh disappointment awaited him.

Upon becoming aware of the nature of the place, he thought at least that there could be no difficulty in gaining admission to it.

On arriving, though, he found that the huge folding doors were so securely fastened that he could not break them open.

With a heavy sigh he sank down.

For some time he remained thus, utterly dejected, but the intense cold and discomfort of his situation made him resolve to make a fresh attempt to gain the shelter of the building.

By this time he had regained a little strength, so he rose and walked round the walls.

Only one opening presented itself, but this was so high up that he feared he should not be able to reach it.

It was an aperture similar to that which may be seen in the wall of a loft over a stable.

Against the wall, however, a tree was growing, and if it was only strong enough to bear his weight he fancied he might succeed.

At any rate he showed himself willing, for he made the attempt.

By dint of much exertion he climbed up into the branches, which bent dangerously beneath him, but did not break.

Higher—higher still he crawled, until, after twenty ineffectual attempts, he succeeded in forcing himself through the opening.

He found below him a quantity of straw, on to which he stepped with caution, for upon his first entrance the interior seemed pitch dark.

Very soon, however, his eyes accustomed themselves to the small amount of light there was in the place.

Crawling cautiously forward a little, he found that the building was furnished with an upper floor like a loft.

Here then he made sure he should be able to repose himself for any length of time he thought fit.

Certainly the doors were fast, and no one could enter without his having due notification of it.

So far, then, all was as well as could be expected.

Sighing heavily, he once more extended himself at full length and closed his eyes.

A state of semi-consciousness succeeded.

It was not sleep, and yet something wonderfully like it.

The fact was that he suffered as much, perhaps more, from want of food than any other cause.

Since leaving Drury Lane, now about four-and-twenty hours ago, he had tasted nothing but brandy.

The immense quantities of the stimulant of which he had partaken doubtless had the effect of rendering him insensible to the pangs of hunger, but for all that it had failed to supply proper nourishment, hence this terrible prostration.

How long he might have remained in the state we have described he knew not, yet fancied it could not have been long, when he heard something like a human voice.

He started up at once, and listened intently.

Weary as he was, all his faculties were at full stretch, and his apprehension of danger morbidly acute.

Yet on this occasion his sharpened senses would seem to have played him false.

Although he listened so intently, he could hear nothing.

Believing at length that some accidental sound had misled him, he was about to resume his former position, when he felt certain he heard the sound of footsteps.

This time there could be no sort of doubt upon the point.

His first act was to draw his pistols.

It seemed scarcely possible that his foes should be approaching, but yet they had shown themselves so often in places where they were least expected, that he strongly felt the necessity of being on his guard.

He cocked his weapons, and scarcely was the operation finished when the footsteps ceased.

The murmur of voices then followed, and although Dick could not distinguish what was said, in consequence of the suppressed tones in which the conversation was carried on, yet he was confident that the speakers were close at hand.

A moment afterwards he heard a rattling noise.

It was caused by a key being thrust hastily into a lock, as though some one was full of impatience to gain admission.

But this impatience in effect only produced delay, for the key would not act properly upon the wards.

A cry of angry vexation followed.

Then the door was pushed open.

A cool rush of night air came in.

There was a square hole in the flooring of the loft, doubtless made for the purpose of facilitating the storing or removing whatever the loft might contain.

Dick was at the edge of this opening, looking down.

The opening of the one half of the huge doors by which Dick had vainly attempted to gain an entrance to the building brought to view the forms of two persons.

Dark as it was, their figures were clearly distinguishable against the night sky.

At the very first glance, Dick's apprehensions vanished, and he restored his pistols to his pockets.

But his curiosity was instantly inflamed, for one of these two persons was a female, and so far as the obscurity would allow him to judge, a young one.

Her companion was a short, thick-set, muscular-looking man, and the first words he said were:

"Now, Jane, why don't you come in?—what do you stand there for like that, dilly-dallying? Come in, I say!"

The tones of his voice were rude and harsh, and his speech was caused by a reluctance or rather disinclination on the part of his companion to enter the gloomy building.

"Oh, Stephen," she said, at length, in a trembling, tearful voice, "I feel so frightened—so terribly afraid—I feel that I shall die if ever I go in there!"

The man started slightly, but recovered his self-possession almost instantly as he said:

"Die, Jane? What do you mean?"

"Don't be cross with me—pray don't! I am nervous!"

"But what do you mean by talking about dying?" he replied, if anything, with additional fierceness.

"Mean, Stephen?"

"Yes, mean!"

"N-nothing—I am only so frightened!"

"But what have you to be frightened of? Ain't I here to protect and take care of you?"

"Yes, yes—I know you are, and I am very, very foolish—I know I am very foolish; but I cannot help it."

"Well—well, come in—let's have no nonsense! You ought to know by this time that you ought not to be afraid to go anywhere if I am with you."

He took her by the arm.

Her fear of exciting his anger seemed to be greater than her dread of entering the building, for she suffered him to lead her in passively.

"There," he cried, "what have you to be afraid of, I should like to know? The place is rather dark, to be sure; but, then, what matters that? It is safe—quite safe. We may be sure of being able to remain here without anyone interrupting us, for, to my knowledge, not a soul has been here these twelve months."

The girl was silent.

"Here," continued the man, "sit down and rest yourself upon this straw—then you will soon be better."

She acquiesced, but it was with a heavy sigh, as though a trouble of no ordinary character weighed her down.

Her companion assumed an attitude of listening, and Dick Turpin immediately held his breath, lest that slight sound should be detected, for though he was certain he had nothing to fear from these new-comers, yet he by no means wished to be discovered by them.

"Can you hear anything, Stephen?" asked the girl, noticing his attitude, and speaking in consternation.

"I thought I did; but I will go and see, and make sure, directly."

"No—no. You must not leave me! I——"

"Hush! I say. Are you sure you did all that I told you, Jane? I have not had the chance of questioning you before."

"Yes," was the reluctantly-spoken answer.

"That is well, then. You are quite sure?"

"Yes, quite."

"And is there much money?"

"Enough — enough — surely enough. Oh, Stephen, when I think what a doubly-guilty being I have become, I feel as though I should sink into the earth with horror."

"Then don't think of it—that's all I can say," was the rejoinder, accompanied by a boisterous laugh.

"Oh don't—don't, Stephen. If you had seen them as I saw them, you could not help thinking of it. I shall see my poor parents to my dying day, sleeping the sleep of innocence, while I, their guilty, trembling child, purloined the bag which contained the savings of so many years, and which they wholly relied upon for the future."

"Stop—stop, I say: I won't listen to it!"

"Then if you won't listen to it, why did you urge me to commit so dreadful a crime? Oh, Stephen," she added, with a wild and passionate outburst of grief, "I shall never—never be happy again!"

"Nonsense—nonsense: you will soon forget this—I tell you you will. And you are sure you have the money?"

"Yes, Stephen—yes."

There seemed to be great anxiety upon the man's part to be assured in this respect.

Dick could not fail to notice it, and he fancied that the girl observed it too.

But if so, she did not venture to make any remark upon the subject.

The man was silent for a moment or so, and then in an altered voice, as though he was struggling to restrain some violent emotions, he said:

"Now, Jane, I want you to listen to what I am going to say, and to pay particular attention to it; do you hear?"

[THE HALT OF THE OFFICERS ROUND THE TREE IN WHICH DICK TURPIN IS HIDDEN.]

"Yes," she answered, through her tears.

"In order that our flight may be a successful one, and that no clue be left behind, it is necessary that you should remain here a little while, during which I shall go away to complete the arrangements."

"No—no!" she said, wildly and appealingly. "Don't ask me to stop here alone—that is, not alone, for I shall have my guilty conscience with me! Don't ask me to stop! I cannot—indeed I cannot!"

"But you must!" he cried, struggling to release himself from her strong detaining grasp. "It is imperative! Don't anger me, for I am in no good humour—things have not gone as I thought. Beware how you anger me! Let me go, I say! It is useless for you to try to dissuade me."

CHAPTER MCIV.

DICK TURPIN IS THE SPECTATOR OF A TERRIBLE CRIME WHICH HE IS TOO LATE TO PREVENT.

SPEAKING these last words, he broke rudely from her, and the girl, clasping her hands over her face, crouched down in the straw, shaking with grief.

"Don't be long, then," she moaned—"don't be long! If you are, you will find me dead on your return."

"Foolish thing, you know that I shall be only a few minutes at the most. Remain where you are—don't stir till I come back. If you do—if I find that you have been to the door during my absence, I will leave you to your fate and take my flight alone. Do you hear me?"

"Yes—yes."

"Why don't you answer, then? I am going now—remember what I have said."

saying, he quitted the building, taking care to close the door after him, though he did not fasten it.

The sound of his footsteps could be heard a little while, but soon they died away, and then all was silence.

Silence and darkness too.

It was now no longer possible for Dick to make out the form of the young girl, save by means of his imagination.

She did not stir, but remained crouching down among the straw, sobbing as though her heart must break.

Dick was much interested in what had taken place, but at present could not see his way quite clear in the affair.

That there was some villany afoot he felt convinced.

Everything in the man's manner and conduct pointed to this fact.

The mere fact of his leading his companion to so solitary a place at such a late hour was enough to give rise to the strongest suspicion.

What his object could be in leaving the girl where she was defied Dick's conjectures altogether.

That he left her for the purpose mentioned he did not for one moment believe, and he therefore awaited his return with nearly as much impatience and anxiety as Jane herself.

What seemed to him a long time elapsed—how long he could not profess to tell, for under such conditions it is difficult to keep note of the flight of time.

During this interval many thoughts passed through his mind.

He was certain that the girl was in danger, without suspecting it, and consequently felt that she ought to be put upon her guard.

But, then, he was well aware that she was in a state of excessive nervous agitation, and any attempt to attract her attention would doubtless fail, so much would she be overcome with terror.

He was busy thinking of some means by which he could do this, when his ear caught the sound of returning footsteps.

The young girl heard them, too, for she started up.

The chance now was lost.

To utter a warning was impossible, for the footsteps paused just outside the door.

Then, without any appreciable lapse of time the door was flung open, and the man appeared.

With a hysterical cry the girl bounded towards him.

Dick saw him shrink back a pace and raise his hand.

He thought at once the rascal intended to strike her a cowardly blow.

But there was a flash, a report, a shriek, a crash, all seemingly mingled together, and the young girl was next seen lying motionless, with her body half across the threshold of the building.

After the accomplishment of his crime, the man stood for a moment or so as though stupified.

Dick himself was taken by surprise.

He had believed from the first that some crime had been meditated, but the deed had been done so suddenly as to deprive him of all power of saving her.

The highwayman was the first to recover the use of his faculties.

So great was his horror that he forgot all about his own fatigue and weakness in the strong desire he had to seize the murderer.

To drop down from through the hole in the floor, through which he had made his observations, was an easy enough matter.

The man, hearing a sound within that building which, to the best of his knowledge, was untenanted by any living soul, started; but his fear seemed too great to allow him to run away.

The next instant Dick Turpin stood before him.

"Villain!" he cried. "I have been a witness to your crime, nor will I leave you until you are made prisoner!"

With a howl of dismay the assassin gave a great bound, then turned and fled.

Dick made an ineffectual attempt to capture him.

His finger-nails broke against the ruffian's shoulder, but the grasp was missed.

Dick, however, instantly started off in pursuit.

It would seem, however, that the sound made by the discharge of the pistol had been heard, and had caused an alarm, for not far off across the fields, twinkling lights could be seen and the hum of voices heard.

Dick shouted out at the top of his voice.

The man, seeing this fresh danger in front, changed his course.

But in doing so his foot caught violently against some obstacle which he had failed to notice.

The consequence was, that in spite of a vigorous effort to save himself, he fell sprawling on the ground

Before he could rise the people with the lights arrived upon the scene.

Many strong hands were laid upon him, and he was forced to rise.

Dick arrived immediately afterwards, and at first—no doubt in consequence of the disordered state of his apparel—he was looked upon with considerable suspicion.

But these suspicions were quickly found to be ill-grounded.

"It be Stephen Phillips. I told you it wor," said a voice; "and when I say a thing agen, perhaps you'll believe me."

"My daughter—my Jane—my poor girl!" ejaculated an old man, with trembling accents. "This is the serpent that has lured her from her peaceful home. What has he done with her—where is she?"

"I believe I can answer those questions," replied Dick. "She has been foully murdered by that rascal, and you will find her weltering in her blood."

"Where—where?" asked a dozen voices.

"On the threshold of yonder building."

"Keep him secure," said some one, in an authoritative tone. "On no account let him get loose."

After this there was a general move towards the highwayman's late place of shelter.

As he had said, they found the poor girl lying on the threshold in a pool of blood.

But she was not quite dead.

The appearance of so many people around her, and the glare of light, brought her fluttering spirit back to life again.

With a wild burst of grief her father flung himself down beside her, and raised her head.

"Jane—Jane!" he cried. "My only one—my dear one! Look up—look up! Live—live! and all will be forgiven!"

Tears rolled down her cheeks, and as she shook her head mournfully, she said:

"I do not deserve this—I do not deserve it! It goes to my heart like a keen knife! You do not know half the extent of my deep guilt."

"Were it ten times as great it is forgiven. Are you not my daughter? But as for the wretch who has brought you to this, I will hunt him to the death—I will show him no mercy! The bitterest curses of a broken-hearted father be upon him!"

"Hush—hush! Say no more. Forgive him, as I do."

The last words were very faintly uttered.

By the light of the lanterns it could be seen that a terrible change had come over her pallid countenance.

All knew it to be the herald of death.

The frantic grief of her father was now terrible to witness.

He called upon her by a thousand endearing names; he even assured her that her villanous lover should be exempt from his just resentment.

But all was in vain.

Death would not be cheated of his prey; and with faintly-whispered words of contrition and self-accusation on her lips, the young girl expired.

By this time Dick found that there was a village not far off, and that the whole of the inhabitants of it had been aroused, and were hastening to the spot.

To attempt concealment was now useless, and, therefore, he stood forward boldly and as though he had nothing whatever to dread from being seen.

As may be expected, he was overwhelmed with questions, to which he was able to return satisfactory replies.

The next proceeding was to put together a rude kind of bier, on which poor Jane was tenderly placed.

The whole party then proceeded to the village.

Dick accompanied them.

He had been seen, and such being the case, he felt he might as well take all the advantage of it that he could.

Sorely indeed was he in need of proper rest and refreshment, and now he had the chance of obtaining both.

The body of poor Jane was carried to the home of her heart-stricken parents, while her murderer, Stephen Phillips, was secured, bound, and placed in the village cage.

Dick made his way to the inn, which seemed now to be the rendezvous of everyone.

Here he had no difficulty in obtaining all he wanted.

He observed that many looked doubtfully upon him when he stated that he had sought a night's lodging in the old barn, but they were very far indeed from suspecting his identity.

At length he retired to the chamber which had been prepared for him.

Locking the door and placing his weapons in readiness for instant use, he flung himself upon the bed.

Sleep visited him almost instantly; and in spite of all the dangers by which he was beset, no one on that night slept sounder than the highwayman.

He awoke just as it was beginning to grow light.

There was a confused feeling about his brain which lasted for some time.

Recollecting at length all that had occurred, he rose and looked out.

He found there was just beneath his window a sloping shed, and beyond that a small garden bounded by a low hedge.

No sooner did he observe this than he resolved to take his departure.

He was now altogether refreshed and rested, and quite ready for anything which might occur.

If he stayed at the inn during the day he would be no doubt subjected to a close scrutiny; besides, the intelligence of the murder might have the effect of bringing to the place some officials who, from the widely-circulated descriptions of his person, might recognise him.

Moreover, there was the chance now of going without anyone noticing the direction taken.

This was decisive; but first of all he gave his attention to making what alterations he could in his costume and general appearance.

With the aid of water and a brush he effected a considerable change in a short space of time.

Certainly if by chance seen by anyone, he would by no means attract that amount of observation which he would have done in his former disordered, travel-stained state.

"I have a better chance now," he muttered, as he completed his preparations. "I shall be no longer the conspicuous object I have been. This guinea will well recompense the landlord for all I have had."

As he spoke, he placed upon the table the coin he had just mentioned.

Then, cautiously and noiselessly, opened the window.

To Dick, the passing through this aperture was a matter of little difficulty.

The roof below was covered with ridged red tiles, so that it was comparatively easy to descend in silence and safety.

Then, when he dropped, the soft garden mould upon which he alighted gave forth no sound.

He paused a moment in a crouching position, in order to make sure that no one was near.

All appearing quite safe, he rose, and made his way swiftly along the gravel path.

The hedge at the end of the garden was cleared easily, and he pushed on as fast as possible across the fields, so as to place plenty of space between himself and the inn he had just left.

He did not pause until he had gone a couple of miles.

Looking scrutinisingly around, he failed to perceive either a human being or a dwelling.

A feeling of triumph filled his heart.

"I have eluded them!" he cried, with exultation. "I have had my revenge. They will have to ride back to London empty-handed. It would be a great triumph if they captured me; but they have failed—ha, ha!—yes, they have failed!"

This belief elated Dick considerably; but he was soon reminded of the proverb which advises everybody not to holloa before they are out of the wood.

The change that came over him was remarkable.

All at once he dropped flat to the ground, and remained there motionless as a stone.

Just when he had finished speaking, he observed a body of horsemen emerge from a thick belt of trees, which had up to that moment entirely concealed them from his sight.

He knew at the very first glance that these horsemen were police officers.

What could have brought them to this spot was beyond his power to conjecture.

Nor was he at all certain that they had not seen him.

Several minutes elapsed, during which he endured no ordinary amount of anxiety.

At last his surprise grew to such a pitch that he was compelled to raise his head a little and reconnoitre.

His foes did not appear until he had assumed almost an erect position.

Their backs were now turned to him, and they seemed to be making their way towards the inn Dick had so recently quitted.

"Have I such good reason as this to congratulate myself upon having taken this determination? Are they about to seek me there? Can they have learned that some one answering to my appearance was at the scene of murder last night? It may be so—it may be so."

He watched the retiring police officers until they had disappeared from view.

Then, turning round, he again made his way as swiftly as he was able across the open country.

"I was congratulating myself a little too soon," he said. "I made certain that by this time they had abandoned the pursuit. But they must have heard of me by some means or other, and no doubt are now fully impressed with the belief that they will find me at the inn."

Dick had good cause for congratulation, as, if the officers had really discovered him at the village public-house, his chances of getting away would have been slight indeed.

"If I only knew which way to take to reach the sea-coast at the nearest point," he exclaimed, as, having ascended a hill he looked around him in the hope of being able to catch a glimpse of the blue waters. "I cannot be far from the coast, that is certain. The question is, in which direction does it lie?"

Again he glanced around him, but he was not able to catch sight of anything that would help him to solve this question.

"Chance must for the present be my guide," he said, at length. "It will not do to stay here—I must keep in motion; and I will take my course at random until I find some means of discovering the right way."

Dick was quite right when he said it would not do for him to remain long in one place—it was only by keeping continually in motion that he should be able to avoid his foes.

In good truth, however, he had nothing but chance for a guide, the part of the country he was now in being one to which he was an utter stranger.

The only thing was that he took care to go so that the officers were at his back.

The day might now be said to have begun, and already Dick had come a considerable distance without, as he believed, having left one single clue behind him by which he could be followed.

Up to the present moment, in consequence of the earliness of the hour, he had been able to avoid being seen by anyone.

But now that the period had begun when labour would commence, his chances of doing so much longer were slight indeed.

A rest would have been agreeable, but he kept on his way, all the time being keenly on the look-out for the appearance of anyone.

He was also watching for some place where he could conceal himself during the busiest portion of the day, when the chances of meeting with people would be the greatest.

It was long, however, before any place presented itself.

Chance led his footsteps past what he had thought at first to be a stack of bricks, but which upon a closer inspection turned out to be a brick-kiln.

It was situated in the midst of a large space of ground.

As the walls would offer at least a temporary shelter, he resolved to stay for a few minutes at any rate and rest himself.

It was not long, however, before he came to the determination to stop there if possible till nightfall, for upon looking around he perceived many indications that a long time had elapsed since any fires had been lighted or men worked there.

A slight drizzling rain began to fall, which added much to Dick's discomfort; but it had one advantage—it doubtless served to keep all those persons indoors except such as were compelled to be abroad.

Probably this was the reason that Dick never once caught sight of a human being, although his vigilance was unceasing.

So soon as ever distant objects began to grow obscure and dim, he quitted his hiding-place and took his way in the direction that he had all along been pursuing.

Vainly, however, did he look around him for an indication of what he sought.

The rain now had ceased, and although it could not be said that night had actually commenced, yet in the eastern sky a glimpse of the rising moon could be obtained.

There was indeed every prospect that the night would be a fine one, and that he would have the advantage of the moon's rays to direct his footsteps.

The sharp pangs of hunger ere long made themselves felt, and Dick knew well enough that unless the demands of Nature were complied with he should stand but a poor chance of escaping from his foes.

But the difficulty was, how could he procure what he required without being seen?

The evil seemed unavoidable.

He was pondering upon it, when a collection of houses, so small as scarcely to be worthy of the name of village, presented itself a short distance in advance.

He could not resist making his way towards it, despite the manifest risk of so doing; but, then, he knew that this was the only chance he had of appeasing his hunger.

As he approached the houses he quickened his pace.

The first place which presented itself was the village inn.

Wistful indeed was the hasty glance he gave through the uncurtained window.

He caught sight of a comfortable-looking room lighted up by the ruddy beams of a huge fire.

Dick sighed, and passed on.

At one other house only was a lighted window perceivable, and in this the illumination proceeded solely from a tallow candle placed close to the green-hued lattice panes.

This Dick discovered to be one of those miscellaneous establishments indigenous to every village.

There was scarcely any article they did not keep in stock; the window itself was crammed with a truly heterogeneous mass of goods.

Dick paused a moment, as though half inclined to enter and purchase what he wanted; but before he could make up his mind his ear caught an approaching footstop, which warned him to be cautious.

The footstep was coming from the direction he was taking.

A meeting with a person, no matter who, was of all things what he most wished to avoid, yet how was he to help it in the present instance?

There was no time either for consideration, as the newcomer was close at hand.

After a moment's thought, Dick drew back to the wall contiguous to the window of the little shop, that being the spot cast into the deepest shadow.

He pressed himself close against the wall, and waited for the pedestrian to pass by, trusting to remain unseen himself if he kept quite still.

Directly afterwards he caught sight of a boy in a smock frock, who carried in one hand a basket.

The shop appeared to be his destination, for he pushed open the door and entered.

Dick seized the opportunity to move on.

Famished as he was, however, he could not nerve himself to go very far away from the shop.

He paused irresolutely, wondering what stratagem he could put into execution that would serve his purpose.

He was interrupted in his ruminations by seeing the boy emerge.

He came forwards with a lounging gait.

"Perhaps," muttered Dick, "I may be able to get from him what I want; and surely in this obscurity he will not be able to see me very well. I will try it."

Dick stood still, and waited for the boy to come up to him, when he intended to ask him for something out of his basket.

Dick stepped forward somewhat suddenly.

"My boy——" he said.

But he had no time to say any more.

With a yell of terror, the boy dropped his basket and ran off as though he had seen a ghost.

"Confound him!" said Dick. "What does he mean by that? Surely he could not have been frightened at seeing me? And yet that must be it. No matter, let us see what is in the basket."

Dick stooped and picked it up; but did not stop to examine the contents for fear that the boy's clamour should have aroused the villagers.

Once more he struck off across the country; and, coming presently to a quiet spot, he paused to make an examination.

"What a fool the boy must have been," he muttered. "If he had stayed I would willingly have given him the worth of the basket and its contents ten times over."

Dick said no more, for he found bread, butter, cheese, and other articles, with which he thoroughly succeeded in appeasing his hunger.

He saved a portion also, which he resolved to carry with him in readiness for another meal.

The basket he flung away, and having done so, he recommenced his journey in better spirits.

He came at length to some wooden palings, which stretched themselves before him like a wooden barrier.

The wood of which they were composed was old and quite covered over with moss.

"This is the boundary of some gentleman's estate," he thought; "and there is no knowing how far I may go before I reach the end of the fence. I will keep straight on at all risks; perhaps, too, in these private grounds I may be safe."

Without further delay Dick cleared the palings.

He pushed his way through a kind of cover or preserve, which, owing to the branches being nearly stripped of leaves, by no means looked so dense as it did ordinarily.

But if this was a disadvantage so far as concealing him from observation went, yet it enabled him to make his way more readily through the mass of luxuriant underwood which, in the summer-time, formed a dense entanglement among the trunks.

In his course the highwayman disturbed nothing save a few pheasants and other birds of a similar kind, which flew heavily around his head.

Emerging at length from the plantation, he came to open ground, which again was skirted by woodland.

Suddenly the deep silence which had prevailed for so long was broken by a sound, to which Dick listened with all his ears.

It was the chiming of bells.

Well did he remember the last occasion when he had heard such sounds, and a feeling of so much loneliness and desolation came over him at the reminiscence, that for a time he was quite unmanned.

Still he counted the strokes borne to his ears upon the gentle night breeze.

"Ten o'clock!" he ejaculated at length, when the chiming sounds had ceased—"ten o'clock! The hour is getting late, and I am, I fear, much farther from where I want to be than I imagined. I am terribly afraid that I have made an awful mistake—that in some way or other I have doubled upon my course. How I have done so I know not. One thing is certain: I ought to be many, very many miles away from York; and yet I never made a greater mistake in my life if those are not the bells of old York Minster that I have just heard."

If this was the case, he must indeed have doubled strangely upon his course.

"It cannot be," he said, again—"I will not believe it. Some village clock close by must have deceived me by having a similar jingle—I must be miles and miles from York."

But Dick said this more with the delusive idea of being able to stultify his own mind than because he really thought it.

His ear was an accurate, well-educated one, and it was always sufficient if he heard a sound once to know it a second time.

Could it have deceived him in this instance?

The question was one not easily decided, and so, after pausing a little longer in irresolution, he continued as before.

He had not advanced a dozen yards, however, before he found himself confronted by a stone wall—probably forming the opposite boundary of the grounds he had been crossing.

Here he paused and pressed his hand to his brow like one trying to call back something to his recollection.

"It is odd, indeed," he presently exclaimed, "if I have not somewhere seen this wall before—the only question is, where? Can it have been—— Yes—yes, it must be so!"

All at once he had remembered that it was close to a stone wall that his priceless mare, Black Bess, had fallen in the agonies of death; then he had dragged her through an iron gate, and covered her with leaves.

Could he be near this spot?

Had some strange fatality directed his footsteps to this spot?—was he now within a few paces of where Black Bess was lying calmly and tranquilly in death?

Or was he misled by some chance resemblance? for to a great extent all such stone walls are alike.

He would have been more inclined to the latter supposition, had he not heard the bells.

If upon climbing up and looking over he should find the high-road on the other side, the coincidence would be more than strange.

He determined, however, not to remain long in perplexed doubt upon this point, especially as it was one that could be so easily resolved.

By the aid of a contiguous tree he quickly gained the summit of the wall.

At the first glance he saw that the high-road was indeed beneath him, and so far as he could judge by that imperfect light, the road leading from London to York.

It was a matter of great importance that he should be quite certain whether this was really the case or not; and at the same time an irresistible desire came over him to look once again if possible upon the form of his matchless steed, for even now he could scarcely realise that she was no more—that she would never carry him again.

CHAPTER MCV

THE OFFICERS AVAIL THEMSELVES OF THE ASSISTANCE OF A COUPLE OF BLOODHOUNDS TO DISCOVER DICK TURPIN.

"If it should really happen," said Dick Turpin, "that I have been really brought back so strangely to my mare's last resting-place, not one word of repining or regret shall escape my lips. Indeed, I shall be rather inclined to rejoice at the chance, for, now I come to think of it, I shamefully ill-treated and then deserted her."

His voice shook so that he could no longer speak.

"What though I rode to York in so short a time—what though the feat be deemed by all an unparalleled one—what though we are ever after remembered through it? Will that bring back my noble steed—the only tie that I had left upon the earth? Bah! this is idle talk! I will cease—yes, I will cease at once!"

He sat still for some moments on the wall.

He was beginning to see more clearly now.

Bitterly indeed did he reproach himself for the past; and the mere fact that those regrets were so entirely vain as they were, only gave additional poignancy to his deep sorrow.

He knew now the hollowness and mockery of Fame. He himself was an example of how it would lead men on to extraordinary achievements; but now that he had accomplished that which in the prospect had looked so tempting to his eyes, he experienced nothing but disappointment and desolation, instead of the triumph and satisfaction that he believed awaited him.

"But I will not desert you, Bess," he suddenly broke out. "If instead of being near to your last resting-place I am fifty miles from it, I will know no rest until I have made my way there. You shall at least receive something like a decent burial at my hands. It is the only thing which I can do for you now; and slight and trifling as it may seem, yet it shall be done."

As he pronounced the last words, in accents of stern resolution, he slipped off the wall into the roadway.

"First and foremost," he continued, "I will satisfy myself as to whether I am right or wrong in my suppositions. Now I come to remember, I saw a milestone just before she dropped. If I can find that milestone I shall have no difficulty in finding her."

The anxiety he now experienced was absolutely uncontrollable.

He could not even control himself sufficiently to walk, but ran hastily forward, although he was by no means certain that he was going towards York.

He had only the remembrance of the direction from which the sound of the bells came to guide him.

That, however, was if anything a spur rather than a check upon his excitement, being well aware that, no matter which direction he took, he must of necessity ere long reach a milestone, and then all doubts would be removed.

If he had to retrace his steps through starting wrong, it was a mistake easy of rectification.

Fortunately for him, the road was clear, for just then so great was his state of excitement that it is questionable whether he would have allowed the appearance of any one to turn him aside from the immediate execution of his project.

He was quite breathless when he at length caught sight of the white milestone his eyes were so longing to behold.

Moderating his pace, and dashing from his brow the falling drops of perspiration that obscured his view, he stooped down to make out the figure denoting the number of miles.

"It ought to be a three," he said, straining his eyes; "and it is too! Yes—yes, there can be no mistake about it. How strange that I should get back here!"

Beyond all question Dick Turpin had actually made his way round to the point from which he had started.

But he positively rejoiced at the discovery, and looked out for the little iron gate.

After going a short distance he perceived it.

He increased his pace, pushed open the gate, and was soon by the side of the heap of leaves with which he had covered Black Bess.

Not a little of the anxiety which he felt was owing to his doubts as to whether her resting-place had been discovered and disturbed.

A glance showed him that he had no grounds for apprehension on this score.

The heap of leaves was just as he had left it.

A moment or two elapsed, however, before he could control himself sufficiently to put forth his hand and uncover a portion of his mare.

At length he did so.

She laid there calm and still enough—so calm that he almost envied her the freedom from all trouble which she enjoyed.

"My poor—poor Bess!" he cried, kneeling on the leaves and burying his face in his hands. "My best and most faithful of friends, you are past my aid now. No words of mine, no matter how uttered, will rouse you now. There is one thing that I can do for you, and only one, and it will go hard with me if I don't manage it."

He paused and listened.

"It was but the wind. All is calm and quiet—there is little fear that I shall be disturbed in this place. I will place you beneath the turf, my poor Bess. It is the last service I shall be able to render you. I owe you that at least. By my good-will no one shall ever learn the whereabouts of your last resting-place."

So speaking, he rose as though about to commence the task he had assigned himself.

But all at once he seemed to recollect that he had none of the tools that were indispensable to the carrying out of his intention.

For a little time this difficulty troubled him.

"Digging implements must be had from somewhere," he murmured. "I cannot do without them; and I will not abandon my design for such a trifling thing as this. But where are they to be had? Let me think—let me think."

His reflections soon took a definite shape

"Beyond all doubt," he said, "there must be somewhere in the grounds a house or rather mansion of considerable size. It ought not to be a very hard matter to find it; and about some of the numerous outbuildings, with which it is as a matter of course surrounded, it will be strange if I don't find a few gardening tools. Then all will be easy enough. I will go now at once."

Carefully replacing the leaves he had removed, in case during his absence anyone should pass that way and ascertain what was hidden there, he quitted the spot.

It is needful, however, that we leave him for a brief space, during which we shall make the reader acquainted with a few of Mr. Skellum's movements, which it is necessary should be known.

The last mention we made of him was when Dick perceived him and his party apparently going in the direction of the inn he had just left.

Such was indeed his destination, and how it came to be so is easily explained.

In the first place, Dick Turpin was very much nearer the city of York than he had the least idea of.

Therefore the news of the murder of the young girl was transmitted very speedily, and Mr. Skellum heard of it, if anything, a little before daybreak, for he had left instructions that he should immediately be aroused if anything of an unusual character took place.

Mention of course was made of Dick, about whom, as we have already stated, there was a good deal of suspicion.

Half a word was enough for Mr. Skellum.

He jumped to the conclusion that it must be Dick in a moment.

"This is his work!" he exclaimed. "I will lay ten thousand pounds of it! Be quick! If he is at the inn we shall be sure to have him!"

No time was lost in getting ready for a start, and, having had the position of the little village accurately described to him, Mr. Skellum resolved to make his way to it by the nearest cut.

This, then, is how it happened that Turpin saw him while making his way across the open country.

Upon arriving at the inn, of course he found, to his infinite chagrin, that the bird had flown; and, moreover, there were so many versions of the affair that he scarcely knew what to believe.

He also found that in one point at least he had been mistaken.

The murder had been none of Dick's work, as he had so positively stated it to be, for the coward Stephen, the very first thing in the morning, made a full confession of his guilt.

Finding himself wrong where he felt so convinced he was right, naturally shook Mr. Skellum's faith in other matters.

Nevertheless, an immediate search was instituted for the person who it was agreed on all hands had slept at the village inn and disappeared.

But Dick had been very careful not to leave a track by which he could be followed; and the police officers, having nothing but the acuteness of their own perceptions to guide them, as a matter of course rode off in precisely an opposite direction.

Inquiries were made, but without result.

No one answering to the description given had been seen by anybody.

Different directions were tried with no better result, until a kind of circle had been described, of which the inn was the centre.

To the place last mentioned they finally advanced, in order to breathe their horses, and also in the faint hope that they might be able to learn some news of importance.

On their arrival Mr. Skellum found awaiting him a personage of whom most of the peasantry in the vicinity stood in no ordinary dread.

This was no other than Sir Humphrey Yeomans, an old English baronet, possessed of not a few of the prejudices and peculiarities which at that time generally belonged to those in his position.

Mr. Skellum was made acquainted with this fact by the landlord.

"Look here," he said. "Take a word of caution—mind what you are about—take care what you say."

"Why?" asked Skellum. "Who is he and what does he want?"

"In the first place, he is the owner of all the land and whatever is upon it for as many miles and more than you have ridden to-day, and, consequently, of no slight importance."

"He must be immensely rich?"

"I believe you; one of the richest men in England, I should say."

"And he has asked for me?"

"Have I not said so?"

"Do you know what he wants with me?"

"I believe it is to make some inquiries of you about this Dick Turpin of whom you are in search."

"Where is he?"

"Up in my best room, drinking wine, and waiting for you."

"What brings him here to-day? Does he often come?"

"He calls frequently, because, you see, this is the Yeoman's Arms."

"Yes—yes; but his business here to-day?"

"He has ridden over, I believe, in his capacity of magistrate, just to make himself acquainted with the facts of the case."

"He is a magistrate, then?"

"Yes; and no one knows what else besides. But I should advise you not to stop any longer gossipping with me, but to go up to him at once."

"I will do so; but tell me first what kind of behaviour does he generally receive—very humble, I suppose?"

"Yes—rather so."

"Likes to have his vanity flattered?"

"Oh yes."

"Enough. Lead the way; I will follow."

As the reader must have seen, Mr. Skellum was evidently a man of the world.

He always had his eyes open to every chance there was of betteriug his condition; and he no sooner heard that he had been inquired for by so great a personage, than he began to wonder how he could best turn the incident to his advantage.

The cue he had received was quite enough, and he followed the landlord upstairs with a confident step.

But as soon as he was ushered into the chamber a remarkable alteration came over him.

He made a very low bow, and then stood, hat in hand, just across the threshold.

The landlord closed the door.

But Skellum, although his eyes were so cast down, had taken a tolerably good view of the baronet's appearance.

He can best be described by saying that he was an excellent specimen of a wealthy old English squire: his ruby face and claret-coloured nose standing out in remarkable contrast against his spotlessly-white wig and his portly form, clad in a garb that showed it off to admiration—a garb, which it is to be hoped will some day again come in fashion.

Perceiving he did not speak, Mr. Skellum bowed again.

"Sit ye down, mon—sit ye down," said the baronet, pointing to a chair.

Mr. Skellum, with a little well-affected hesitation, presently complied.

We quite despair of producing upon paper the worthy baronet's peculiar vernacular, and so we will not even so much as make the attempt.

Besides, the broad Yorkshire dialect spoken a hundred years ago would scarcely be comprehended by the majority of readers now.

"I want to know something about this high-flying chap," he began, abruptly, and pushing the bottle across the table as he spoke. "Just fill up your glass and let me know all about it."

Skellum did so; and Sir Humphrey, without giving him time to commence his narrative, said:

"I suppose you are one of the Lunnun regular police officers, Mr. A—a——"

"Skellum, your worship," was the reply, given as though he was begging pardon for having a name which the baronet did not know.

"Ah! Skellum."

"I am not a regular officer, your worship; but I have been sent out as a special agent from the Government to break up and abolish the gangs of robbers that have been the terror of all travellers for so long."

"And very right too."

"I may venture," said Skellum, in a humble, modest way, "to say that I have been tolerably successful. Out of four of the most desperate of these highwaymen only one remains."

"You captured the others?"

"In a strict manner of speaking, your worship, I did not capture them; but I brought about their destruction, which is the same thing."

"Just so—just so. And they are all dead?"

"Yes. And ere long the one who has given me more trouble than all the rest of the lot put together will be in the hands of the authorities."

"Good—good—very good!" assented the baronet, spreading out his hands and warming them, while he reclined at his ease in the most comfortable chair the inn possessed.

"D—n all such varmint, say I; and if I had got them to deal with, I should make short work of them. The authorities are a d—d sight too particular and lenient, that's my opinion! There ought to be no ceremony shown to such wretches; no, nor poachers either."

"You are quite right, your worship, and I make bold to say those are exactly my sentiments."

The baronet was quite pleased to find his opinion so cordially shared in by one he firmly believed to be a special Government agent, and to whom in consequence he was prepared to show no little respect.

Mr. Skellum was invited to fill up his glass, and then the baronet said:

"But I am told that this Dick Turpin you are so anxious to catch is no ordinary rogue."

"No, that he is not."

"I have heard some impossible story about him riding one horse from London to York here in twelve hours, but of course it is not true."

"I must beg to assure you that it is true."

"True?"

"Yes, true."

"He actually did it?"

"Yes: I was witness, otherwise I should have been as incredulous as you are now."

The baronet opened his eyes to an extraordinary width, and even pushed his chair away from the fire, so great was his astonishment.

"And you mean to assure me that one horse brought a man two hundred miles in twelve hours?"

"I am ready to take my oath of it, your worship, only it was a mare and not a horse."

"I am bound to believe you, and yet it seems impossible still."

"It does."

"And what has the villain done with his mare?"

"Rode her till she dropped down dead under him on the high-road, somewhere about three miles this side of York."

"Then d—n him for a villain!" said the baronet, in great wrath.

He struck the table several heavy blows as he spoke, and also gave utterance to some other expletive that would by no means look well upon paper.

His anger somewhat surprised Mr. Skellum, who was unable to arrive at the precise reason for it.

"And you are sure the mare is dead?" was the baronet's next question.

"Yes—that is, as sure as I can be, without having seen the dead body."

"The villain—the rascal! I would have given a thousand pounds, ay, two thousand—any money—for her. She was a prize, a masterpiece—worth her weight in gold! And to think that she should have the misfortune to fall into the hands of a d—d scamp like that, who could ride her to death! D—n me if that isn't the very worst crime he has ever committed!"

The baronet's indignation here became too great for sober utterance.

There could be no doubt about his thinking that Dick Turpin's treatment of Black Bess was an unpardonable atrocity.

"I'll tell you what," he cried at length, "such a scoundrel is no more fit to live than a poacher! And, Mr. Skellum, or whatever your name is——"

"Skellum, humbly begging your worship's pardon."

"Well, if you will let me join with you, I will soon make short work of the d—d vagabond—that I will!"

"I shall be very happy, your worship, if you would only be kind enough to give me your valuable advice and assistance."

"You shall have them, d—m me—you shall ha them! Here, have another glass, and I'll have another, for this d—d business sticks in my throat! The idea of murdering such a creature—yes, d—n me, it's murder and nothing less!"

Mr. Skellum could hardly yet understand the baronet's inconsequent.

He did not know that Sir Humphrey prized a horse above all things in the world, and in his mind there was scarcely any crime greater than injuring one.

Sometimes he used to wonder which could be the worst, that or poaching.

"Your worship," said Mr. Skellum, after rather a long pause, "I should be glad to know what are your opinions—or, rather, what it is you thought of doing in the matter?"

"Ah—very good—you did right to remind me. But you don't drink."

"I have important business, if your worship would excuse me——"

"Tut—tut! A drop of this will only steady your nerves a little. However, as to what I was about to say."

Mr. Skellum prepared himself to be most attentive.

The baronet, before commencing, drew his chair a little nearer, as though it was his intention to be very confidential.

"You must know, in the first place, that poachers are my plague—yes, the plague of my life! I know no rest or peace for them."

"Can you not put them down?"

"I have tried, but then they get off and hide themselves—they can't be found; and then there is proving the charge. But I have got a plan against them that will put a stop to it, and help you to capture this Dick Turpin, d—n him!"

"I am most anxious to know what this plan can be, your worship."

"No doubt, and therefore I will not keep you in suspense another moment."

Mr. Skellum was, in good truth, most curious to know what the baronet was going to say.

"Look here," he began. "A friend of mine abroad has a remarkably fine breed of bloodhounds. What do you think of that?"

"Well, really, your worship——" stammered Skellum, who could not for the life of him think what this circumstance had got to do with the case.

"I see you don't catch at the idea. But I will be more explicit."

Skellum inclined his head.

"This friend of mine, then, some time ago procured me a couple of these matchless creatures, and a little while ago they arrived. They are magnificent! Their training has been everything training should or could be. At present I have made no trial of their powers; but I am assured that once placed upon the track of anyone they will never quit it."

"I have heard of such animals," said Skellum, with a disagreeable sensation pervading his whole frame; "but I have never seen one."

"You shall see mine," said the baronet, who prided himself not a little upon possessing them.

Not knowing exactly what to say, Skellum filled up the pause by bowing again, though he shivered slightly as he did so.

"Of course you guess what I had them for?"

"Well, I—a——"

"To get rid of the poachers."

"Ah!" responded Skellum, with a long breath.

The baronet's countenance assumed a fierce and most vindictive expression as he continued:

"Yes, for the poachers. I have been waiting for them for some time, but they have heard of the bloodhounds, and they have been scared away."

"But your worship, I suppose, merely intends to use these animals as inspirers of terror? You would not use them?"

"Yes, by —— would I if I had the chance!" was the vindictive rejoinder. "The very first time I hear of any being seen I shall call out the bloodhounds, put them on the scent, and quickly track them out."

"But I have heard," said Skellum, deprecatingly and hesitatingly, "that if they happen to catch up with the person they are sent after they will tear them to pieces if some one is not at hand to call them off."

"And if they do, what then? Is it any more than a d—d rascally poacher deserves? Not a bit of it. I should like to make sport of serving them all in the same way."

Mr. Skellum, as the reader knows very well, was neither over nice nor particular about what he did, but yet the baronet's cold-blooded manner made him shudder in spite of himself.

This bitter animosity against poachers was something he could not understand.

To him, the capture of a few pheasants or hares seemed a very trifling offence.

But it was clear that the baronet thought it one of the blackest of crimes, and the perpetrators of it not worthy of the consideration shown to human beings.

"Now look here," he went on—"these bloodhounds are just the very things you want. There will be no trouble in putting them upon the scent, because it seems pretty clear that the fellow got through the bed-room window and dropped into the garden."

Mr. Skellum wiped the perspiration from his brow.

"Rely upon it they would soon find him," proceeded the baronet, "and would save you a world of trouble—perhaps prevent the fellow getting off altogether. If you are inclined to try the plan you are quite welcome; I should like to see the fun, and it would also be making a kind of trial of my dogs, which I am very anxious to do."

Mr. Skellum hardly knew what reply to make to the baronet's proposition.

We must do him the justice of stating that the idea of hunting anyone with bloodhounds was repugnant to his feelings.

Side by side with this admission, however, must be put the fact that this repugnancy was not of very long endurance.

He thought about the reward and the credit he should lose if Dick Turpin was not captured.

"Besides," he said to himself, "he is only a highwayman."

Another consideration which weighed much with him was, that if he declined, the baronet would, of course, be very much offended, and Skellum felt that he could not afford to make a foe of so powerful a personage.

That clinched the matter.

"Well?" said Sir Humphrey, who had been waiting in no less impatience than surprise for Skellum to reply.

"I will be frank with your worship," he said. "At the first blush, I must say I did not care about the plan, chiefly, I suppose, because it is out of the ordinary course in which we do our business; but, upon consideration, I feel extremely anxious that it should be tried, for I don't care about telling your worship that if this fellow slips through my fingers it will be a very serious affair for me."

"Very well, then," exclaimed Sir Humphrey, rising, "I am glad we have come to a satisfactory conclusion."

"Are the dogs here?" asked Skellum, anxiously.

"Not here: but they are at the kennels. I will soon have them."

He tugged violently at the bell-pull while he spoke

The landlord made his appearance with marvellous speed, for he knew well the impatient character of his guest.

"Send Jackson up to me," said Sir Humphrey, briefly.

The landlord bowed and retired.

There was then a silence of a minute or two's duration.

It was broken by a faint tapping at the door.

"Come in!"

"Jackson," cried the baronet, "I want you to ride over to the kennels at once, and bring the two bloodhounds. You understand?"

"Yes, your worship.'

"Be off, then, and make as much haste as you can."

Jackson withdrew, and Skellum and the baronet, now the best of friends, imbibed a few more glasses of wine.

The former did indeed feel as though his nerves wanted steadying; but as for Sir Humphrey, it was clear he attached but slight importance to the act of hunting a human being in the same way as some wild animal.

He was used to hunting of various kinds, and looked upon a highwayman as no better than a poacher, and only worthy of being treated in the same manner.

At length intelligence was brought that Jackson had arrived with the dogs, and thereupon Skellum and the baronet both went downstairs.

While the latter was examining the ferocious animals, the former was getting his men together and explaining to them the nature of the unexpected aid they had received.

The men, who had began to think that they were to have no other reward than their trouble for their pains, brightened up at this intelligence, and prepared to set about their task with more spirit and alacrity than otherwise they would have exhibited.

No time was lost in making these preparations, still a good while elapsed before all was ready.

At length the two dogs, which were securely held in slips or leashes, were taken round into the garden, just under the window through which Dick had passed.

They were long-bodied, fawn-coloured animals with massive legs and large, square heads.

Already they had been taken up into the room Dick had occupied in order that they might get familiar with the smell.

They now exhibited the utmost uneasiness and impatience—sniffing the air, howling and struggling desperately to get free from the slips in which they were held, and almost dragging Jackson away in their efforts.

"Is all ready?" asked the baronet.

"Yes, your worship," replied Skellum—"everything."

'Very good, then. Let go, Jackson."

At a touch, Jackson set free the dogs and hastily scrambled on to his horse's back.

The dogs ran round two or three times, sniffing, howling, and barking.

Then, having found the track, they started off, holding their noses close down to the ground.

"Now they are right," said Jackson. "They will find him, no matter where he is, for the track will everywhere be newer and fresher than it is here, and consequently more easy for them to follow."

"Capital—capital!" cried Sir Humphrey, entering with great ardour upon the chase.

"The only thing we have got to do," continued Jackson, "is to keep them in sight so as to be able to call them off. If we don't, they will tear the poor devil in pieces."

The horses were good and fresh, and the speed of the bloodhounds not very great, so that it was very easy to keep up with them.

Skellum and his men were much excited.

To them, the proceedings had that charm which nothing but novelty can impart.

Every motion made by the dogs was followed by them with the closest attention, and beheld with wonder.

There was a little delay occasionally, owing to the track being lost, but the dogs running on in front and careering round in circles quickly recovered it, and started off again.

Despite these delays, however, the reader will scarcely require to be informed they made much greater speed than Dick Turpin did, and consequently there was little doubt that they would ere long come up with him.

CHAPTER MCVI.

DICK TURPIN BECOMES AWARE THAT THE BLOODHOUNDS ARE ON HIS TRACK.

"I AM afraid the darkness will spoil the sport," said Sir Humphrey, in tones of vexation, as he noticed the growing obscurity. "I had no idea it was so late."

Nor had anyone else until the baronet called attention to the circumstance.

The fact was, that each and all had been so much occupied and excited by the strangeness of the events that were taking place, that they never noticed the night's approach.

It happened, too, that the daylight had been considerably prolonged, as it often is at the approach of winter when the sky is unobscured by clouds.

[DICK TURPIN CONCEALS HIMSELF IN THE GARDEN WALL.

But no sooner had the sun set than there came a sudden darkness over the whole face of Nature without the intervention of half the usual space of twilight.

It was the night setting in thus suddenly that caused the baronet to give vent to his angry exclamation.

There was no fear, though, that on this account he would abandon the pursuit.

Jackson, however, said as much as he dared give utterance to in the shape of objection.

"We shall find it very difficult to keep the dogs in view, your worship."

"Then we must keep them in hearing," was the gruff rejoinder—so gruff that Jackson closed his mouth without daring to say another word.

Mr. Skellum looked anxious and uneasy.

He by no means relished the probability of seeing and assisting in the tearing to pieces of a fellow-creature, even though that fellow-creature should be a highwayman, and Dick Turpin to boot.

The baronet did not seem to be troubled with any such scruples.

Glancing towards the east, and perceiving a faint illumination in that quarter, he added:

"We shall have the moon up before long; and as there are no clouds, we shall be able to see well enough. Besides, I know every inch of the ground round the place."

He seemed also to think this quite sufficient for everybody, though Mr. Skellum and his followers were perfectly ignorant of the nature of the ground, and experienced no little difficulty in making their way across a rough, open country.

Skellum's horse stumbled twice, and on the second occasion forced a remonstrance to his lips.

"Your worship," he said, "don't you think it would be as well, or even better, to defer the chase till daylight? In the dark no one can tell what accident may happen."

No. 244 will be Published next Thursday.

The very idea of abandoning a chase after anything when it had been once commenced, was so preposterous a one, that it fairly took his breath away, and a minute or so elapsed before he could make any reply.

"Put it off? Never! My motto is: 'Never put off.' Besides, if we waited till to-morrow the scent would grow cold, and in the meantime he might get a horse and ride away, in which case we should lose him altogether."

There was so much determination, or rather bulldog obstinacy in the tones in which Sir Humphrey spoke that Mr. Skellum, like the man Jackson, judged it expedient to remain silent.

For some time a general silence reigned.

The obscurity now was so much increased that the attention of everybody was pretty well occupied in taking care that their horses had firm level ground beneath their feet.

Suddenly, Sir Humphrey gave vent to an ejaculation of a forcible character.

"They've got him—they've got the rascal! D—d if I didn't think we should have him before very long! Come on, quick, will you!"

These remarks were called forth by the dogs setting up a terrible howling and barking; and from the nature of the sounds it was evident the creatures had come to a stop somewhere.

The baronet was quite confident that they had seized their prey, and so great was his ardour in consequence, that he speedily outrode all the rest, despite the efforts that were made to overtake him.

Mr. Skellum felt by no means so confident as the baronet; but then that will not be wondered at when it is remembered what a many times he had been disappointed.

Still, he kept up close to the rest, and quickly caught sight of what he took at first to be a cottage or barn, but which on a closer approach turned out to be a brick kiln.

He arrived just in time to see the dogs bolt off again; but there was nothing of the highwayman to be seen.

The baronet was staggered for a second or two, because he had made so very sure that the chase was over.

That such was not the case, however, was unquestionable, for the bloodhounds were once again in full cry.

The brick kiln, as the reader doubtless suspects, was the place where Dick had passed the hours of daylight.

Of course, here the scent was comparatively warm, not a very long time having elapsed since he quitted the place.

"Forward—forward!" he cried, as soon as he recovered from his astonishment. "They are in full cry now, and you may depend, after all, he is not very far off."

This, by the increased animation of the dogs, seemed to be highly probable, for they ran on and barked as though mad.

All anxiously passed onward.

Even Mr. Skellum forgot the danger of the path in the anxiety he felt lest the dogs should come up with Dick and tear him to pieces before the arrival of anyone who could call them off.

Up to the present moment they had had things all their own way, but they found themselves destined to experience a reverse.

All at once the dogs met with a fault—that is, they lost the scent; nor were they able to find it again, although the sagacious animals went round and round in wide and wider circles, in the hope of coming up with it.

The baronet fretted and fumed in a manner that on any other occasion would have been provocative of a smile.

But the present instant was too grave for smiling.

"What's the best thing to be done, Jackson?" asked Sir Humphrey.

"Well, your worship, as you know, I have not had much experience with these creatures, but I suppose the best thing will be to stop where we are until they recover the scent again. They will let us know when that takes place, you may depend."

"Yes," assented the baronet, "I suppose it will be the best to stay here, otherwise we may be riding our horses up and down here and there to no purpose."

"And we might breathe the horses a little the while," said Skellum. "That last bit of ploughed land has taken the steam out of mine, I can assure you."

The halt was thus agreed upon, but the baronet was too impatient and too excited to remain still very long.

Nothing would do but Jackson must ride after the dogs and observe their movements.

This was done.

Still all efforts were unavailing.

It then became the prevalent impression that he must have mounted, and so there was an end of the affair.

But the baronet was unwilling to come to this conclusion, and held out against it as long as he was able.

At last, after what seemed, to him especially, a whole age of suspenseful waiting, the deep baying of the bloodhounds made itself heard.

The sound floated over the silent meadows as though it came from a considerable distance.

"Off and away!" yelled Sir Humphrey, with a furious tally-ho!—"off and away—there, now we have him!"

The chase was now recommenced in real earnestness, and, if possible, under greater excitement than before.

Away they all went helter-skelter, with Sir Humphrey at their head, and all the rest after him like a flock of wild geese.

It is a thousand wonders several of them did not meet with serious accidents, for the ground was very rough and rugged.

The continual baying of the dogs was a tolerably good guide for them to follow, and in a short time they had the further assistance of Jackson's voice, who shouted out to them continually.

On coming up with him the noise made by the dogs was explained.

He had managed to secure them, and he now stood holding the slips just in the same way as when they left the inn.

That they had recovered the scent again was evident enough, for they almost pulled Jackson along with them in the violent attempts they made to get away.

"What is the meaning of it?" asked Sir Humphrey, as he reined up in order that the others might all come up with him. "How can they have lost the scent?"

"Easy enough, your worship; I can quite understand it."

"How is it, then?"

"Why, he must have taken to the road for some distance, and there, owing to many other people and vehicles passing over his footsteps, the scent was destroyed."

"Of course that's it," said Sir Humphrey, with an air of great satisfaction. "And this is just where he has taken to the open country again."

"Exactly so. Yonder is the lane."

Jackson pointed to a low hedge a few paces off, as he spoke.

Previously to entering the village where he had so terrified the boy that he dropped the basket of provisions he was carrying, Dick had walked along the lane, where his footsteps were obliterated.

But the dogs, by going round and round in circles in the manner we have described, had eventually come upon his trail again, though much time had been lost in doing so.

"Let go the dogs," said the baronet; and at the word the slips were unloosed.

In an instant, with guttural growls of satisfaction, the dogs bounded off.

"We must make good speed," Sir Humphrey cried, "or we shall lose them in this darkness."

It did, in good truth, require an eye of more than ordinary sharpness.

The obscurity was very great, for along with the moon clouds had arisen, and it was only occasionally through the straggling rifts that her beams reached the earth.

The dogs kept on steadily; and all at once Sir Humphrey was struck with a circumstance which he had failed to perceive before.

"May I be d—d if we are not going straight towards home, and by a nearer cut I think than ever I took before! Surely the rascal has never had impudence enough to go there?"

"He has impudence enough for anything, interjected Skellum.

"But do you think he would rob me?"

"No doubt he would if he had the chance."

"Curse the villain! Perhaps he is at the Hall now, frightening her ladyship into hysterics."

This idea, for which there was no very reasonable foundation, made the baronet's anxiety and impatience increase tenfold.

But as the pursuit was continued, it became more and more evident that they were riding direct to the Hall, for the dense belt of trees surrounding it was every now and then seen distinctly in the moonlight.

As they came nearer they saw not only the trees, but the very palings which marked the boundary, towards which the bloodhounds were careering headlong.

The baronet spurred his horse so violently that he got far ahead of the rest, though they tried hard to keep up with him.

The dogs all at once came to a stop at the foot of the palings, where for a second or two they howled dismally.

Then they ran up and down sniffing and whining.

Finally, to the surprise of the baronet, they came towards him a little way.

Then giving a spring, they cleared the high palings by a desperate effort, and immediately afterwards could be heard going at full cry through the plantation.

The baronet was so carried away by the chase, and so excited by the positive intelligence he had now got that Dick Turpin was actually on his own grounds, that he rode his horse at the fence as if with the intention of clearing it.

It was insanity to make the attempt, for not only were the palings about twice as high as a horse could be expected to leap, but there was no space of ground to alight upon on the other side, for the trees grew thickly everywhere.

The horse, however, seemed all at once to become aware of one or both of these circumstances, for he stopped short while in full career.

No event could have taken Sir Humphrey more by surprise than this, and the consequence of his unpreparation was, that he shot over the head of his horse like a rocket, and stopped against the old palings so suddenly and with so much force, that it was a wonder he did not break through altogether.

The horse seemed frightened at what it had done, and appeared as though it was about to try a bolt in the opposite direction.

At this moment, however, the others arrived; and Jackson, stretching out his hand, very adroitly seized the animal's bridle.

By the time this was done and before any assistance could be rendered him, the baronet scrambled to his feet, to all appearance being neither hurt nor confused by his terrible fall.

But then he had been canted out of the saddle more than once in his life.

"Don't stop!" he cried—"don't stop! I'm not hurt—not hurt a bit. Where's my horse? D—n it all, the fellow may be at the Hall murdering everybody!"

"The dogs are on his track, that is certain," remarked Jackson, as he assisted his master to mount. "What a racket they are making, to be sure!"

All the place was echoing loudly with the barking of the bloodhounds, and Skellum fancied that the reason was they had found their prey.

The inevitable delay caused by the incident we have just described, put him in a terrible fidget.

He was wondering, too, how the palings were to be surmounted.

But the next words spoken by Jackson relieved him on this point.

"Now, Sir Humphrey, if you will follow me, we will be after the dogs in a twinkling."

But how are we to get over the palings?"

"There is not the slightest necessity for doing so, nor for going through the plantation, since the dogs are no longer in it."

"But where the devil must we go?"

"There is a little gate in the palings a few yards below."

"A gate!" exclaimed the baronet. "I never heard of it."

"That may be; but one is there, though it is never used. It opens upon a little path, along which we can ride with ease, and so get to the other side of the park, where I take it the dogs now are."

"They seem to me closer to the Hall. But lead on and be quick."

Thus admonished, Jackson skirted the park palings, and presently stopped at a little door which, though narrow, still seemed wide enough to allow one horse at a time to pass through.

"I daresay it's fastened," Jackson cried, as he slipped from his horse; "but if your worship don't mind, I'll soon have it open with a stone."

"Open it how the devil you like so long as you are quick about it."

A large stone lay conveniently close to the gate, and Jackson, picking it up, flung it with all his might against the place where the lock might be supposed to be.

There was a crash, and the door swung back upon its hinges in a moment.

The baronet pushed through in a desperate hurry, closely followed by Skellum.

The path was bounded on both sides by dense masses of trees and shrubs, and was only just wide enough to allow of the passage of one horse at a time.

The barking of the dogs still continued, and if anything, with increased fury.

But on emerging into the open ground, the baronet and the rest were at fault for the guidance of Jackson, who knew all the intricacies of the grounds better than anyone.

The loud cries of Sir Humphrey quickly brought him in view, and he again took up a position in advance.

"I know whereabouts they are. Follow me."

Just as he pronounced the last words all were startled by the ringing report of a discharged pistol.

Before anyone had time to speak a word, this first report was followed by a second, and then, strangest of all, an absolute silence followed.

The dogs ceased their barking as if by magic, and this abrupt cessation of sound so affected all that they could do nothing else save stare in each others' faces.

The baronet was the first to recover himself.

"May I be d—d," he yelled, "if I don't believe the villain has killed the dogs! How is it they don't bark, Jackson?"

"I can't tell, your worship. Let us rush forward and see."

This was such a reasonable thing that no one hesitated a moment, especially as Jackson suited the action to the word.

Before long, however, they reached a spot where the trees grew so densely that it was quite out of the question to think of riding among them.

"We must alight here," cried Jackson, "and push through on foot. Get your arms ready in case they are wanted."

Before he had finished speaking every saddle was empty, and the riders engaged with all possible speed in securing their horses to the numerous branches around.

This done, still under the guidance of Jackson, they forced their way through the little wood, for such it seemed to be.

But there was no longer any indication to show them where the dogs were.

Jackson, however, led the way with a great deal of confidence, for he had already decided in his mind whereabouts it was he had last heard the sound.

That he was no bad judge was quickly proved, for all at once he stopped and cried out:

"Here they are!"

The others, who were a little in the rear, pressed forward, and saw a sight for which they were not altogether prepared.

Lying at the foot of a tree were the two bloodhounds.

The cause of their silence was manifest.

Each one had received a pistol bullet in the centre of the forehead, the effect of which must have been to produce instantaneous death.

Their limbs yet twitched convulsively, and the blood continued to gush from the wounds.

But what shall we say of the effect of this spectacle upon the baronet?

We fear our powers of description will altogether fail.

We may, however, state that he at first stood stock-still like one stunned with some terrible calamity.

Then for the next phase he broke out into a torrent of the most horrible invectives conceivable.

If curses could have killed Dick Turpin he would not have survived a moment.

The baronet's resentment against the highwayman was in all conscience strong enough, but the loss of his much-prized bloodhounds increased the intensity of it a thousandfold.

"D—n his blood, but I'll have the life out of him for this!" he exclaimed, after the first fury of his anger had abated. "He can't be far off——"

"No, that's certain," interrupted Jackson, who was kneeling down beside the lifeless animals; "they are quite warm yet."

"And he shall be warm before long, I'll promise him! He's about the grounds somewhere. Search well for him, and the first that finds him shall have a hundred guineas out of my pocket!"

As may be supposed, this offer produced an immediate effect, and without another word the whole of the party eagerly dispersed, searching closely in every direction.

But as they forced their way through the luxurious vegetation, all thought that a better place of concealment could scarcely exist, and therefore that their chances of finding the highwayman were small.

With an utter disregard of personal consequences, the baronet plunged among the underwood.

The skin upon his face and hands was fearfully scratched.

The clothes he wore were torn into long strips by the bramble bushes through which he urged his way.

But, regardless of these minor evils, he continued to struggle on.

To him, Dick now was worse than a thousand poachers; and he promised if he caught sight of him to favour him with the contents of a pistol first and call upon him to surrender afterwards.

Anxious moments elapsed.

A great rustling could be heard, caused by the men struggling with the low-growing branches of the trees and the dense undergrowth, but no sound was heard indicative of the fact that a discovery had been made.

And of course the more time that elapsed the more distant became the chance that they would succeed at all.

And yet there was indisputable evidence of his having been there so very recently that it scarcely seemed possible that he should have escaped.

Skellum looked upon his disappearance as most extraordinary; but he was fast reaching a point when he would cease to be surprised by anything Dick might do, no matter how incredible or astounding it might appear.

Half an hour elapsed, during which the little plantation had been thoroughly searched, but without result.

It was then determined by Skellum and the baronet, who happened to encounter each other, that a consultation should be held as to their future proceedings.

The question was, how could all the men be summoned to that particular spot?

Skellum soon hit upon an expedient.

He fired a pistol.

As he expected, the report was followed by a great trampling of feet, and in a very short time indeed the whole of the troop had assembled, all being most eager to know what had happened.

Their disappointment was great so soon as they became acquainted with the actual state of affairs.

All now were of the unanimous opinion that the highwayman was not in the wood.

Had he been, they could scarcely have failed to light upon some traces of him.

"He must have made a straight rush for the stone wall and escaped," said Jackson; "I feel certain he is not here."

"Unless he should be in some of these trees."

"We should see him if he was, I fancy, for the branches have scarcely a leaf upon them."

"True," assented Skellum.

"But what's that?" exclaimed the baronet, as he raised his hand suddenly.

A faint rustling was heard.

The sound came from somewhere very close to the spot on which they stood.

CHAPTER MCVII.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN EFFECTUALLY DISPOSES OF THE TWO BLOODHOUNDS.

We go back now to Dick Turpin.

It will be remembered that when we left him last he was about to make his way towards the Hall, in order to obtain those implements necessary to enable him to carry out his firmly-fixed intention of burying Black Bess.

He had nothing whatever to serve him as a guide as to the direction in which he ought to go.

Clearly, however, the first thing to accomplish was to get clear of the trees, which now prevented him from seeing even a yard in advance.

At length he found before him an open space, but before venturing to step upon it he remained just so far within the wood as to be well shadowed by the trees, whilst he proceeded to reconnoitre carefully.

The ground before him had a park-like appearance, for the grass was smooth, and here and there stood a noble-looking tree.

But although he looked most scrutinisingly around him he failed altogether to perceive the slightest indication that a human habitation was in the vicinity.

His attention was, however, soon attracted by a sound which seemed to furnish the clue of which he was so anxiously in search.

This was the loud baying of dogs.

"The house must be over there then," he muttered, looking in the direction from which the sound had come. "Those are doubtless the watch-dogs in the yard."

But scarcely had he finished speaking before he discovered that he had come to a most erroneous conclusion.

With a sudden bound he saw emerge from the trees which bounded the open space on the opposite side, two huge, fierce-looking dogs.

They were the bloodhounds.

But, unfortunately, Dick did not recognise them as belonging to this dreaded breed.

Their fierceness, however, made him resolve to abandon for the present his intention of emerging from his present place of concealment.

"There may be a keeper or some one in company with those dogs," he muttered; "doubtless there is. I will draw back a little, for fear they should discover me."

He drew back accordingly, still being in ignorance of the fact that these two dogs were foes more to be dreaded than police officers themselves.

The reader must bear in mind that the bloodhounds hunting by the smell never once quit the trail, even though it should wind round several times and the object of their pursuit still in the centre.

In this case they will follow carefully in all his footsteps—not make a direct rush towards him.

This, then, is how it happened that they did not discover Dick much earlier than they did.

They tracked him to the stone wall, from there to where Black Bess was lying, and finally came direct upon him.

Dick heard their approach.

He had wondered much that he had seen nothing of human beings in charge of the ferocious creatures.

But when he heard them crashing through the dry brushwood, the suspicion of what they were first occurred to him.

"They are bloodhounds!" he gasped, and as he pronounced the awful words a cold sweat broke out all over him.

For the accounts which Dick had heard of these much-dreaded creatures had been highly exaggerated.

He believed that, once fairly set upon the track, it was next to a total impossibility that the victim should escape.

But there was no time for thought, for the ferocious animals were very close at hand indeed.

Yet, before Dick could recover from the kind of stupor of despair and horror into which this discovery had thrown him, he saw them appear.

But the sight of the fierce creatures, with their foam-covered flanks, red eyes, and lolling tongues, seemed to electrify him into sudden life.

With a wild and desperate instinct of self preservation, he sprang up and seized the branch of a tree that extended itself a little distance above his head.

The agility which he displayed in drawing himself up and seizing another could not have been exceeded by any squirrel.

In the twinkling of an eye he was astride a branch, and, temporarily at least, out of the reach of his bloodthirsty foes.

But if he had gained nothing else, he had at least obtained time to think a little.

Under such circumstances anything like calm reflection was well-nigh impossible, for the bloodhounds, furious with disappointment, were making frantic efforts to ascend the tree.

Dick knew this to be far beyond their powers, but yet he could not help watching their movements almost to the exclusion of everything else.

Yet it was not long before Dick was conscious that his foes were somewhere in the rear of the brutes to which they had assigned the task of hunting him.

If so, he might expect them very shortly to make their appearance, and if so, his present place of vantage would be but of slight avail.

Something must be done, and at once.

"I do believe," he said, "that I could shoot them easily. They are so close that I could take a most careful aim. Then when they are disposed of, surely I may be able to find some other hiding-place before my pursuers arrive."

There could clearly be no better course of action for him to adopt than this.

Accordingly, he drew forth one of his pistols, and having satisfied himself that it was in perfect order, aggravated his foes by hissing.

They all at once reared themselves up against the trunk of the tree and barked furiously.

The opportunity had now come.

They were within two or three feet of him, so that to miss was almost impossible.

He fired.

The bullet crashed through the brute's skull.

With a sound such as Dick had never before heard, it fell bleeding and lifeless to the ground.

Then, before a moment had elapsed, his companion shared the same fate.

These two much-dreaded enemies being disposed of, there was nothing to prevent Dick from descending the tree.

The reader may be sure he was not long in doing so.

When he reached the ground, however, sounds were borne to his ear of a character that convinced him his human foes were rapidly approaching him.

He stood still listening, and wondering where he could fly for shelter.

In that place there seemed to be but slight chances of finding any secure place of concealment; and then, as for flight, that was completely out of the question.

Before he had made up his mind how to act, he turned and forced his way through the trees.

But ere he had gone many steps, he saw in front of him a huge tree, the branches of which were thicker than any of the others, and upon which a few withered leaves still hung, thus affording a better chance of hiding than any other.

Dick was half inclined to climb up into it.

While pausing in indecision, he became aware that his pertinacious pursuers were within a few yards of him.

He could not afford to hesitate any longer.

The tree was by no means so easy to ascend as the other one, but Dick had a powerful incentive for exertion, and he overcame with comparative ease obstacles that would have dismayed anyone not similarly situated to himself.

But on gaining the upper part of the trunk of the tree an agreeable discovery awaited him.

The trunk itself, to a considerable depth, was quite hollow; and the width was so great that it would easily allow of the passage of his body.

Here, then, was a hiding-place a thousand times better than any he had hoped to find—and one which could not be discovered unless his enemies actually ascended the tree.

If he was careful to remain quiet there was little fear that they would do this, as the tree itself presented nothing particular to distinguish it from the hundreds of others growing around.

It was therefore without pausing for a moment that Dick lowered himself into the hollow trunk of the tree.

He had quite expected that he should be obliged to descend quite to the bottom.

This, luckily, was not the case, or it would have been no easy task to get out again.

Either the bottom part of the trunk was solid and sound, or else it had been partially filled up with fallen leaves and other matters.

This to Dick mattered little.

He was quite content to take matters as he found them, and desired no further satisfaction than that the actual state of affairs afforded him.

He had scarcely time to settle himself in his hiding-place before he heard the sound of voices and footsteps.

The reader is already better acquainted with what took place after the entrance of Skellum and his party into the wood than even Dick Turpin could be, so that it is quite unnecessary to dwell any further upon this part of the narrative.

But by one of those extraordinary coincidences which occur more frequently than people are aware of, it happened that the spot where the baronet agreed to summon the rest of their party was close at the foot of the very tree inside which Dick had so snugly ensconced himself.

He did not overhear what had been said, but the discharge of the pistol greatly startled him.

So extreme was his anxiety that he had the boldness to raise himself a little and take a peep at what was going on.

He soon comprehended that the pistol was fired merely as a signal.

The approach of the others caused him to sink down again out of sight.

With what interest he listened to all the men had to say about the fruitlessness of their search may perhaps be imagined.

The confident way in which they all declared that he (Dick) was nowhere in the plantation amused him much.

The supposition that he might be in one of the trees disturbed him so greatly that, quite unconsciously to himself, he made a slight movement.

This was the cause of the rustling sound which had reached the ears of the baronet and caused him to cry out in the manner described at the end of the last chapter.

Dick now gave himself up for lost, and this belief caused his heart to beat at such a rate as to make him fearful that this sound would be conveyed to the hearing of the police officers, and so betray him.

This was a groundless fear, but that much suspicion was immediately excited was quite clear.

"Something moved," ejaculated the baronet. "Who heard it?"

All had heard it.

"Then we can't be mistaken. The question is, what can it be?"

"Or, rather, where did the sound come from, your worship?"

"Yes—yes—just so, Mr. Killum——"

"Skellum, your worship."

"Oh, yes, Skellum," said the baronet, correcting himself. "Well, where do you think it came from?"

"I fancy out of this big tree here."

"Nay," said the baronet, "I fancied that was the one."

As might be expected, not two agreed as to the source whence the sound proceeded.

"Let us listen," said the baronet—"perhaps we may hear it again."

All assumed attitudes of intense listening, but, as Dick Turpin took the utmost care to keep perfectly silent in his hiding-place, of course nothing was heard.

Their patience at length being exhausted, Skellum said:

"Perhaps, after all, your worship, it was only a bird, and if so, we are only wasting most valuable time by staying here."

"It may be so, and yet——"

"And yet you do not feel satisfied."

"Not exactly."

"Nor do I; but if I might venture to suggest something——"

"What—what?"

"Why, I propose that, with the view of making sure that the rustling sound we heard was not caused by the highwayman being in hiding, we will fire a shot or two into all the trees round about; that will soon settle the business."

"Ah, of course it will! That is a capital idea, Mr. Killum—a very capital idea."

Skellum thought he had better give up the attempt to make the baronet call him by his proper name.

At a word, the whole of the party got their pistols ready for use.

"I will have a try at that one over there," cried the baronet, alluding to the tree from which he fancied the rustling had proceeded; "and if he is there I will soon dislodge him."

Without any further notification of what he was about to do, Sir Humphrey fired.

A few leaves and bits of broken branches came fluttering down as soon as the pistol was discharged, but no other effect appeared to be produced.

Skellum, however, did not fire himself, nor allow any of the others to do so until, in a formal voice, he called upon Dick Turpin to surrender.

Of course, the hidden highwayman took no notice of this.

He felt tolerably secure in his present quarters, and resolved to abide by the result.

The proclamation being over, a great banging away followed.

Dick shrank down as close as he could, for the tree in which he had hidden himself appeared to be an especial mark.

Had anyone been concealed among the branches of any of the trees around, he must have been discovered.

"It is as I expected, your worship," said Skellum, as he loaded his pistols and placed them one by one in his pockets. "Some accidental sound has misled us, and caused the waste of all this powder."

"I fear so," assented the baronet, with a gloomy frown. "It must have been some bird. D—n the rascal! he is more trouble than all the poachers I have ever met with put all together!"

"Before he is captured, and finally disposed of," remarked Skellum, "I fancy he will give us very much more trouble than we have had as yet."

"He's a monster—he's a—a—— I'll be d—d if I know what to call him!" cried Sir Humphrey, with a fresh outburst of wrath. "There's no name that I know half bad enough to call him by!"

No one made any reply to this speech, which certainly was not exactly of a character to call forth an answer.

There was a very gloomy expression upon the countenance of every person present.

"The waste of the powder and shot is not all," grumbled Skellum, speaking his thoughts aloud rather than addressing himself to those around him. "All the while we have been fooling here we have been giving him the chance to get far enough away; and I know him well enough to feel certain that he would not neglect any opportunity that was offered him."

"Death and the devil!" the baronet broke out again. "Must this be suffered? Can it be endured? Curse him! I could have looked over his being a highwayman—that isn't so bad as poaching—I might even have pardoned him for riding his mare to death, though it was a shameful thing—but to think that he should come into my grounds, and shoot the animals that have cost me so much money and trouble, d—n me! it's too much of a thing! I can't stand it, nor I won't either! I'll have him before I rest again!"

"But what is to be done?" asked Skellum. "That is the question."

"Why, capture him."

"How?"

"That's your business, not mine," answered the baronet, snappishly. "You can't expect me to show you what to do. Just make your mind up, and I and my men will help you."

"Beg pardon, your worship," said Skellum, anxiously, "I meant no offence. Only you'll admit it is very trying to the temper to have one's efforts set at nought in this manner."

"It is d—d trying, and I don't mind admitting that I can't, for the life of me, think what is the best thing to be done next."

Skellum was in the same predicament, only he was not so candid as Sir Humphrey.

Although at his wits' end, he pretended to have so many ideas that he found it difficult to decide upon the best.

"It's my firm conviction," said the baronet, "that after shooting the dogs he would run as fast as he could to the east wall, and get over it into the high-road."

This was the opinion of most present, for, after having satisfied themselves that the person they sought was not in the plantation, this was the only way of accounting for his disappearance.

"If he has gone that way," said the baronet, "the chances are a thousand to one some one has seen him, for I never knew the highway to be quite deserted at any hour."

"I believe you are right," said Skellum. "At any rate, let us try. If he has gone that way, he must have left some trace behind him."

"Just so," said the baronet, as though this was a matter of course.

"Then we will go back for our horses."

"There is not the least reason for that—they can be brought here; and, Jackson——"

"Yes, your worship."

"There is a little iron gate not far off, is there not, through which we can reach the high-road?"

"Yes, your worship."

"I thought so; therefore let us have the horses at once, and you can lead the way."

A very little time indeed was lost in carrying out these instructions, for in reality the place where the horses had been left was not far off.

"I think you may venture to mount, if you feel inclined, your worship," said Jackson, "for we are very close to the path leading down to the gate you have mentioned."

"Very good. Let all get into the saddle at once."

This order was obeyed with great willingness and promptitude, for the exertions they had made in searching among the brushwood had greatly fatigued them.

Dick Turpin, hearing these preparations for a departure, began to breathe a little more freely than he had done, while his heart recovered its usual action.

A strong desire to take a peep at the baronet, whose presence on the scene of action he could not understand, made Dick run the risk of rising up in the tree.

But any slight noise which he might have made in doing so was drowned by the preparations of the men every one of whom was talking busily.

In the obscurity Dick could not see the baronet very well, and yet he thought he should know him if ever he should chance to catch sight of him again.

Fearful that an accidental glance up in to the tree might discover him, caused Dick to resume his former position.

With great impatience he now waited for them to quit the spot.

He had not long to wait.

The necessary preparations for a start were quickly completed, and, with Jackson leading the way, they all rode off.

The sound made by their retreat was audible for some time.

While it was, Turpin did not venture to move a muscle.

But as soon as ever a general silence prevailed, he hastily descended the tree which had proved so good an asylum for him in the hour of need.

His first act was to listen.

All was still.

"They have gone," he exclaimed, with an air of exultation—"they have gone, and I have once more eluded them! The iron gate, they said, did they not? It is close to that where my poor Black Bess is lying. Will they find her? It is possible—very possible. If they do, I shall soon hear of it."

The silence, however, remained as profound as before.

By following the windings of the path Jackson had mentioned, Dick could not, of course, tell how long it would take the party to make their way to the iron gate.

Sufficient time, as he fancied, had already elapsed, and yet he waited, listening eagerly.

The continued silence inspired him with hope.

"How fortunate it was that I had the prudence to replace the leaves! I would not have had them find Black Bess for all I possess! And they have not found her, I am certain. That gives me an idea: if she can escape discovery by being covered over with leaves, why should not I? That is a good thought—I must not forget it. Some time 't may stand me in good stead."

Although tolerably certain that his foes were out of the way, yet Dick could not quite make up his mind what to do.

The desire he felt to carry out his project was strong indeed, but he was conscious that it would be absolute folly to attempt it now, for, though his enemies had gone, he had no means of knowing how soon they might return.

To linger anywhere near was fraught with the utmost danger.

He knew that well enough, yet he could not bear to think of departing until he had rendered Black Bess the service he had promised.

If he did leave, who could tell how long it might be before he was able to return?

At length he came to a decision.

"I will reconnoitre carefully," he said, "and ascertain my exact whereabouts. Above all, I will try to possess myself of the tools which I require. That will be one step accomplished towards the achievement of the whole. Then, if nothing better offers, I will come back and conceal myself in this tree, which has hidden me so well already."

Having arrived at this determination, he noted very carefully the appearance of the spot on which he stood; and when quite certain that he should not fail to know it again, he moved carefully away.

It was necessary that he should be able to find his way back there without hesitation, in case the necessity should arise of having to do so.

Then, having gained the open space we have so frequently had occasion to refer to, he skirted it, keeping well under the shadow of the trees.

In this way he proceeded a considerable distance without making a discovery of any importance.

At length, however, through the trees he perceived an irregular pile of buildings, consisting of a noble dwelling with numerous outbuildings around it.

Dick gazed at it attentively.

He did not know it, but this was the residence of the irascible baronet, Sir Humphrey Yeomans.

CHAPTER MCVIII.

DICK TURPIN FINDS IT MORE DIFFICULT THAN HE HAD EXPECTED TO SHAKE OFF HIS FOES.

Dick Turpin folded his arms and leaned his back against the trunk of a tree, with his eyes fixed upon the placid scene before him.

The moon was shining through some half transparent clouds, which did not deprive the earth of much of her light.

Viewed under such circumstances as these, the old Hall did indeed present a picturesque appearance, for all its roughness and ruggedness were toned down.

Almost unconsciously Dick found himself envying the peaceful inhabitants of this lordly dwelling.

But as the feeling was one unworthy of him, he banished it as soon as he was aware of its existence.

"I am what I am," he said—"a highwayman, and even my enemies are bound to say a bold one. I will run my course. Something comes over me even now that tells me I am near its termination. No matter, I will achieve what I have determined to accomplish. I will not be daunted by any difficulty now!"

He was silent.

But though his lips were closed, the most casual observer could have told that his thoughts were hard at work.

"Yes," he said, at length, with the air of one who by dint of much reflection has arrived at a definite conclusion—"yes, my mind is quite made up. I know now what I will do. I am certain it will be the best; besides there will be no obstacle in the way."

As he thus spoke he turned and retraced his steps.

His determination it soon expressed.

It was to make his way back to his former hiding-place, and remain there until he heard something further.

"I am certain it will prove to be the wisest plan," he continued, as he strode rapidly along. "I have nothing to fear from hunger, for I have provisions about me. Besides, the night is now too far gone to leave time for much to be accomplished. I am glad I thought of this. By to-morrow night the ardour of my enemies will be much abated, and so far as I can see there will be nothing to prevent me from hiding in the hollow tree till then. Most reasonably may I anticipate that to-morrow night they will be tired out. I shall then have every facility for the carrying out of my design."

Quite fixed now in his resolve, Dick hurried on.

Indeed, now the principal thing he had to fear was that he should meet with his enemies returning from their unsuccessful pursuit before he had time to reach the hollow tree.

This proved, indeed, to be no imaginary danger, for ere half the distance was accomplished a loud shout was borne to his ears.

His first impulse was to bound forward with greater speed.

Then he stopped himself, because he became aware that he was running directly towards his foes.

What was to be done?

Their coming now was unmistakable.

They were again searching among the trees.

Before Dick was a large piece of water, apparently a fish-pond.

Thick bunches of dark green flags and rushes could be seen here and there above the surface of the water, which was thickly strewn with fallen leaves.

Another shout and the loud trampling of feet made Dick aware that his pursuers were at the most a few yards off.

The next moment might bring them before his eyes.

What was to be done?

To remain standing there was nothing short of absolute madness.

Yet what could he do?

If he attempted to cross the open space he would infallibly be seen.

If he attempted to enter the plantation how was he to avoid being seen by those who were searching for him so busily?

He had but one resource.

That was to enter the pool.

Naturally enough, he shrunk from the discomfort this would cause, but in a short time it became an absolute necessity.

He could now almost detect the very words spoken by the searchers; and what was more, every moment that elapsed brought them nearer and nearer to him.

He hesitated till he could hesitate no longer.

Gently and slowly he waded in until breast high.

Then struck out towards the centre of the pool.

Great as was his caution, he could not be altogether noiseless, and the faint splash he made reached the ears of the officers.

Their attention being attracted, they one and all set up a cry, and hastened to the water's edge.

"What is it—what is it?" asked the baronet, eagerly, but in a tone of voice which showed that he was fast getting tired of his night's sport. "I heard nothing."

"I heard a splash," said one.

"And I—and I——"

"What was it?"

"That we don't know: we have come to see."

"You must have fancied it. The water is calm enough."

Such was the case.

At the first alarm Dick had drawn his head under water and made his way towards the bush of rushes near at to him.

There he ventured to rise and breathe.

"What's that yonder?" he heard some one say.

"There—there. Is it a man's head?"

"No—no; it is too still."

"I saw it move."

"Fire at it, then!"

An explosion instantly followed

The rushes shook slightly as the well-aimed bullet cut through them.

But nothing else followed.

Dick, who had again drawn his head under water, was unhurt

He lifted it again instantly, convinced that that danger was over, and that the rushes would in the dim moonlight prevent his head from being observed.

"There is nothing here," said the baronet; "anyone can see that."

Yet the officers lingered, for they were by no means satisfied.

But as moment after moment elapsed without the slightest movement being perceptible upon the surface of the water, their doubts vanished, and they withdrew.

Dick heard them for some time calling to each other and crashing amongst the bushes, but after a time all these sounds faded away, and entire silence succeeded.

When this was the case, Dick cautiously made his way to the shore, for he was by no means certain that the officers had not left one of their number on the watch.

On reaching the bank, he prepared himself for any sudden attack that might be made upon him.

But nothing moved.

The silence seemed to deepen.

Hastily plunging among those trees which his enemies had so closely searched just before, he shook the water from his apparel.

His teeth chattered and he shook from head to foot, for the long immersion in the water had almost frozen his blood.

"I must move about till I am warm," he said; "to sit still thus would be the death of me, and if I lighted a fire I should at once betray myself to those who are so eagerly searching for me."

No words can describe the unutterable discomfort he now endured, and it required him to call up all that resolution and stoutness of heart of which he possessed so abundant a share to prevent himself from falling at once into the deepest depths of despair.

But his resolution and active movements quickly caused a glow to overspread his whole form; and when this took place his heart grew lighter and his former feelings returned.

Had it not been, however, for the unabated longing he experienced to re-visit once more his dear Maud's last resting-place he would never have troubled himself to retain an existence that for him was full of nothing save pain.

This object being in view, endowed him with the vigour of body and mind that enabled him to triumph over all his difficulties.

At length, not without some trouble, the hollow tree was found.

In his present forlorn state even this looked to him like a friend, and he hailed its appearance with keen delight.

"I shall baffle them yet," he said. "Despite all their efforts, I shall triumph over them! That is a satisfaction to obtain which is worth enduring a few disagreeables. I fancy now I shall be safe for a time, and my next act shall be to perform the last service I shall ever be able to render my poor Black Bess."

He mounted the tree as he spoke, and ensconced himself in the hollow portion of it in the way he had previously done.

With what patience he could he prepared himself to wait till the time came he had appointed for attempting his design.

When morning came he partook frugally of the food he carried with him, for he knew not how long a time might elapse before he was able to obtain more.

Just so much as was necessary to appease his hunger he partook of, but no more.

Sad indeed were his reflections while in this solitary situation.

He looked back upon the past—upon the time when he had the comfort of the association of faithful comrades who were now no more.

He thought of Maud, too, until the aching of his heart was so great and so unendurable that it seemed as though his heart would break.

"All is over," he murmured, sadly—"all is over now. The old times will never come back again. I am alone and desolate. And why should I take so much pains to preserve my life now that existence is to me so insupportable a burden. Heaven help me!" he ejaculated—"I am miserable indeed!"

He shivered as he spoke, for the morning was a very cold one, and he had never thoroughly recovered from the effects of his immersion.

After some hesitation, he descended from the tree and moved rapidly about.

In this way he succeeded in restoring the circulation of his blood, and feeling once more returned to his numbed extremities.

With what joy he hailed the rising sun need not be told; and though the season was too far advanced for his beams to give forth much warmth, yet they had a wonderful revivifying influence upon the highwayman.

In his utterly forlorn condition even the sun looked like a friend.

The day wore on.

Dick had no other way of passing the time save by pacing up and down like a sentinel.

Suddenly, however, he stopped.

His caution had never once abated, and at this moment his quick ear caught a sound which made him return with all speed to his hiding-place in the old tree.

Hardly had he settled himself when he heard voices and footsteps close at hand.

Whether any special or new danger was thus boded he knew not, and it was for this reason that he raised himself so as to be able to get a view of what might be about to take place.

There was a great crashing among the branches and bushes around, and then Mr. Skellum, with a few of his men and several of the baronet's servants, appeared.

Slowly and silently, Dick sank down.

He was now quite content to listen to what might be said and done.

What to make of their presence about that spot he knew not; but the circumstance was most suspicious.

What should have induced them to return there?

Something evidently.

What that something was he waited patiently in the hope of hearing.

The first words that reached him were these:

"I knew I was right," said some one, whose voice was quite unfamiliar to him. "I was certain I saw something move on the water."

"Well, the bullet produced no effect upon it, did it?"

"No, that's true enough; but still, if we had looked a little closer we should have found him."

"I don't dispute that, for there are the marks in the mud at the side which show that somebody got out of the water lately."

"Never mind talking about that," said Skellum, peevishly. "All the talking in the world won't alter the case. We haven't got him, and all we can do is to look again."

"But do you think he is here, Mr. Skellum?"

"He may be; at any rate, we will satisfy ourselves upon the point."

"Well, if he is here," said another voice, "he is a bigger fool than I take him to be. I know if I was in his place I should be off as soon as I found the opportunity, and the coast has been clear quite long enough for him."

"Never mind," said Skellum, "we will look. He may be in hiding still; and if so, we shall stand a much better chance of discovering him now than we should at night."

Nobody could deny the truth of this proposition, and without further delay the search commenced.

Dick Turpin felt very uneasy.

He knew very well that a search was much more likely to be successful if carried on in daylight.

What he had overheard enabled him to understand perfectly all that had happened; and now the circumstance was brought to his memory, he recollected that on emerging from the pool his feet had sunk rather deeply in the margin of soft black mud which surrounded the water.

With this evidence of his recent presence the search would be keen indeed, and he was by no means certain but that he had left such a track behind him as would enable them to reach his hiding-place.

This uneasiness he had to bear as best he could, for he was quite powerless to make even the slightest alteration in the state of affairs.

[DICK TURPIN ENTERING THE HALL.]

His sense of hearing was all the time kept upon the fullest stretch.

Another thing which troubled him was the possibility that some one or other of the baronet's servants might be aware that a cavity existed in the top of the old tree, and if so, the thought would naturally occur that it would form an excellent hiding-place.

Another source of anxiety was the fear that in their researches they might stumble over the remains of poor Black Bess, and if so, there would be an end to all his hopes of placing her beneath the soil in some unknown spot.

The mention of these things will serve to make the reader sensible of the amount of suspense endured by Dick while listening for every sound that might be wafted to his ears.

But he heard nothing of a decisive character.

Every now and then a sudden cry would make his heart beat at a rapid rate.

But silence would again follow, and he would be left in his former doubtful expectation.

That a very strict and methodical search was being made there could be no doubt, for Mr Skellum was anxious to satisfy himself beyond all doubt that Dick was nowhere in Sir Humphrey's grounds.

As for Dick himself, he felt by no means certain that he had not left such marks upon the sod, while pacing up and down in the way we have described, as would lead to his detection.

More than once, different members of the searching party came close to the old tree, and on these occasions Dick would hold his breath.

But each time they would pass on, and Dick would breathe again.

PRICE ONE HALFPENNY.

At last, many approaching footsteps could be heard, and in a short time it became clear that the open space near the old tree had been appointed as a rendezvous.

"Are we all here?" cried Skellum.

"Yes, all."

"Good! We have satisfied ourselves that he is not here, and now we must go further afield to find him. Follow me!"

So saying, he turned and left the spot, followed closely by his companions.

Dick could scarcely credit the extent of his good fortune.

Most eagerly did he listen to their retreating steps, and when all sounds had died away he murmured:

"Safe—safe once more! My enemies are baffled, and while they are busy seeking for me far away from this spot I shall be able to accomplish that upon which I have so set my heart."

The search in the little wood had occupied a considerable time, for already that duskiness which heralds the approach of night began to spread itself over all surrounding objects.

"A little while," said Turpin—"only a little while, and I shall be able to leave this tree. Then, knowing that the officers have left, it will surely be easy enough for me to obtain a pickaxe and a spade. Yes—yes, I can see now that all will be well."

Slowly the minutes passed, as they always do to those who have no other occupation than to watch the flight of time.

Deeper and deeper grew the twilight, until at length the early night had set in.

It was, more strictly speaking, evening; but it was dark, and darkness was what the hunted highwayman wanted.

"They have gone," said Turpin—"they have surely gone by this time, or I should have heard something long ere this. They have gone, and now I will venture to descend. I will be cautious and careful, though—very—very careful."

On attempting to move, however, he found that his limbs were so much benumbed that he had the utmost difficulty in drawing himself up out of the cavity.

He succeeded after many trials, and then for some moments lay helpless on the grass.

What an easy prey he would then have been to anyone who had chanced to come that way, for, in his present state, to have re-climbed the tree would have been an impossibility.

By degrees he recovered his lost powers, and having done so, made his way towards the Hall.

Almost at every step he felt himself better, for of course the cramped feeling caused by remaining for so long in one awkward position wore off as he moved.

Still it took him a long time to reach the spot where he had formerly stood gazing at the residence of Sir Humphrey Ycomans.

Still availing himself of the cover which the trees afforded him, he crept on nearer and nearer still.

At last he came to a stout hedge which formed the boundary of a small paddock, beyond which was an orchard that was contiguous to a garden and some outbuildings.

This, then, was the point he wished to gain.

Unfortunately for him, the further the night advanced the lighter it became, for the moon was climbing the eastern sky, and her beams were so bright that distant objects could be distinguished with ease, whereas, just at the close of the day, before she rose, the obscurity was ten times as great.

A careful observation, however, convinced Dick Turpin that no one was near enough to observe his movements, and so, by the aid of the branch of a tree, he swung himself over the hedge, along the side of which he crept until the orchard wall was gained.

Here once more he paused, but finding all was still, he was emboldened to surmount this obstacle as well.

He dropped down quickly, and was pleased to find that the fruit trees grew closely enough to each other to afford him excellent cover in his progress.

By the time the orchard was crossed he found himself very near to the hall indeed—so close that it required him to double the caution he had already used.

Looking into the garden, he saw that it was of considerable extent, but now, owing to the time of year, it looked little else than an open piece of ground.

In one corner was what seemed to be a summer-house; but whether it really was so, or whether it was merely a place erected for keeping tools and such-like matters, he could not from his present position ascertain.

Emboldened by the continued silence which prevailed, he at length crouched down and ran towards it.

On arriving, he was disappointed to find that his first conjecture was correct.

It was a summer-house, and a hasty search convinced him that it contained nothing that would be of the least service.

For one thing, however, it provided him with a shelter—a place where he could stand and reconnoitre without much fear of being seen.

But it would appear as though all the people belonging to the Hall were within doors.

"I must get towards those outbuildings yonder," Dick muttered at length. "They are the stables doubtless, and there I may make sure of getting what I want; besides, when once among the buildings I shall be able to keep myself concealed."

In another moment his resolution was taken.

As before, he made a hasty rush across and then stopped.

He was now at the gable end of what he took to be a stable, and before making his way to either side it was necessary for him to be careful.

Just as he was in the act of peeping round the angle of the brickwork he was startled by hearing many voices, and on the instant Mr. Skellum and his entire party of officers came in sight.

Their appearance at this juncture, when they were so totally unexpected, deprived Dick of all power of motion.

He had felt so convinced that they had all quitted the vicinity that he could scarcely believe the evidence of his own eyes.

There they were, however, though for what purpose he could not pretend to guess.

They were advancing, too, directly towards the spot on which Dick stood.

What was to be done?

Drawing back as he asked himself this question, the fugitive gave one hasty glance around.

As he did so, he gave himself up for lost.

Concealment and escape were equally impossible.

He had no other protection than the end of the stable.

There was the summer-house he had just quitted, it is true; but its position was such that he was sure he could not reach it without being seen.

A cold perspiration bedewed his forehead, and between his parched lips he whispered:

"All is over now!"

And yet while he made this despairing speech, his eyes, eager and restless as those of a beast of prey, settled upon an object which in a second revived his extinct hopes.

This was a massive wooden frame supporting a windlass.

"The well," gasped Dick—"the well! Surely I can hide there!"

While uttering the words he rushed forward.

His hand rested a moment on the wooden roller round which the rope was coiled.

"How deep is it?" he asked.

The question was a vain one, for, looking down, nothing but absolute darkness could be beheld.

Nor was there time for consideration.

Unless his movements were characterised by the utmost rapidity, he would be seen—it would be too late.

It was, therefore, with a feeling of recklessness that he seized the rope and slipped down it with the agility of a sailor.

CHAPTER MCIX

DICK TURPIN FINDS THE GARDEN WELL TO BE A MOST UNPLEASANT ABIDING PLACE

So short a space of time elapsed from the moment when Dick Turpin first caught sight of the police officers until he made his rapid descent into the well, that a mere spectator would have been under the impression that, so far from having hesituted, his mind had been made up some time previously as to what he should do in such a contingency.

Dick had seized the rope very hastily, and in his excitement failed to notice that a few coils still encircled the barrel of the windlass, the consequence of which was that he descended with much greater rapidity than he had intended or than was at all pleasant.

When the end of the rope was reached such a sudden jerk ensued as almost to deprive him of his grasp.

But the shock over, he continued to slip down until his feet reached the surface of the water, and then he paused.

The well was of considerable depth, and on looking up Dick could only just distinguish a small circular aperture over which the blue night sky seemed stretched.

He remained a little while listening with great intentness and anxiety, for the rapid revolution of the windlass consequent upon his descent had not taken place without a rumbling, rattling noise which could scarcely fail to reach the ears of the officers, and necessarily attract their notice.

But Dick found it was most fatiguing to hang all his weight upon his arms, and wondered what the depth of water might be.

This was a serious matter, for even if he should have the power to hang by his arms until the danger should be overpast, his muscles would be too exhausted to enable him to climb the rope again.

He slipped down a few inches, and then his feet encountered something which he made out to be the top of the large wooden bucket.

On this he was able to stand easily enough, and his arms were relieved of all fatigue save the slight exertion necessary to enable him to steady himself.

It was just as he had accomplished this much, and prepared to listen again, that he heard the sound of voices.

The first words that reached his ears with any distinctness were spoken by Mr. Skellum.

"But what the devil was it?" he said, very petulantly. "It must have been something. What was it?"

No one appeared able to give any reply to this question, for a complete silence ensued.

"It sounded to me like the rattle of this old windlass; but, then, who could have touched it? There's no one about."

"That's true enough, sir, and we must have seen 'em if there was."

"Perhaps it's the wind," said another.

Oh, how Dick Turpin thanked him for this suggestion, and how he hoped it would be received as a tolerably satisfactory explanation of what would otherwise be a very mysterious and suspicious occurrence!

"But the wind does not blow strong enough," growled Skellum; "and besides, why don't it rattle now?"

This was another unanswerable question.

The officers were all greatly perplexed, that is quite evident, and but for the conviction they all had that Dick had got far enough away by this time they would doubtless have attributed the sound to him.

But the fact of his being there just under their noses was so very improbable that they never once thought of it.

The reason was that they knew Dick had had ample opportunities of getting away had he chosen to do so, and they could not think that there was anything to induce him to prefer remaining there in the very heart of danger.

"It looks deep," said Skellum; and by the difference in the sound of his voice the highwayman fancied that he must be peeping down the well. "I wonder what is down? Try the handle and see."

After hearing these words Dick had just time to let go of the rope and step quietly into the water and that was all.

Some of the officers immediately began to wind up.

The bucket ascended without difficulty, and on reaching the top was found to be full of water.

This did not help to clear up the mystery in the least.

"The water will do for our horses," said one of the party. Shall we have any more?"

"Yes, in a moment."

The bucket was emptied and then lowered.

Dick strained his eyes in the hope of seeing it coming. But in vain.

Every now and then it would go with a sudden bump against the brickwork; and there was considerable probability that it would strike Dick's head before it reached the surface of the water, and if so, the force of the blow would be enough to deprive him of consciousness.

He could protect himself in no other way than by holding his hands above his head, and it was well for him that he adopted this safeguard, for the bottom of the bucket struck his fingers so severe a blow as almost to wring a faint ejaculation from his lips.

The bucket was again drawn up, but still the mystery was as far from being solved as ever.

"I wish I could see to the bottom," said Skellum. "I feel very uneasy and dissatisfied about this business."

"Do you think there is anybody down there, Mr. Skellum?"

"I don't know what to think. It's d—d odd there should have been that row."

"Let us fire down. It can't do any harm, and will settle the question."

No opposition being made by his leader, the man who made this proposition pointed his pistol down the well and fired.

Dick guessed some such steps would be taken, and wondered what he should do in the event of it.

He could only think of one thing, and that seemed simple enough.

It was to remain standing perfectly still.

He had presence of mind enough to know that by standing with his back pressed closely against the brickwork of the well he stood many chances of escape.

No slight amount of nerve was requisite for this, but Dick was never deficient of that quality.

The event proved that he had adopted the right course.

The bullet fell harmlessly into the water, leaving him unhurt.

The explosion taking place in so limited a space had a most deafening effect.

The officers above maintained a profound silence after the discharge.

No doubt they were listening intently.

No sound, however, uprose from the bottom of the well.

"There's nothing there," said the man who had fired.

"So it seems," assented Skellum, though by the way he spoke it seemed tolerably clear that he came reluctantly to the conclusion. "Come on. It is waste of time to stay here. We ought to have been off long ago. I wish I knew what had caused the sound, though."

The officers had only their suspicions that it might have been the rattling of the windlass that they heard.

Had they been sure of it, unquestionably they would not have departed until they had made a much closer investigation.

The sound of their retreating footsteps next reached Dick's ears.

But the highwayman now found himself in a fresh dilemma, and one which seemed to be of as serious a character as any.

When the officers had drawn up the second quantity of water they had omitted to lower the bucket again.

It now stood just on the brink of the well, and the rope was coiled up on the windlass.

Dick was a prisoner.

A prisoner, too, under the most uncomfortable of circumstances.

Standing at the bottom of a deep well, nearly up to his thighs in water, that was so cold as to seem within less than a degree of freezing point, and with hardly any hope of getting out unseen.

What could be done?

It might be that water was rarely fetched from that source, as the labour of drawing up the bucket must have been considerable.

Then, supposing that water was drawn, the bucket might be wound up a hundred times and not left empty at the bottom once.

It was not even there when Dick descended.

He grew fearfully anxious.

His limbs were getting numbed, but he could do nothing to prevent it, and to shout aloud for succour would be to set a seal upon his own destruction.

Never before had he been in a situation of so much perplexity.

Oh, how wistfully did he gaze up to the circular aper ture above, which to him was as inaccessible as the moon.

Many were the plans he tried to raise himself, but the smooth, mossgrown bricks afforded not the slightest hold for either hands or feet; and after many vain attempts he was obliged to abandon the project altogether.

"I must wait," he said—"I have no other resource—I must wait. I must call up to my aid all the patience I possess, and make a virtue of necessity—I must wait—I must wait."

But it was much easier to come to this determination than to carry it out; and Dick felt that never before had his fortitude been put to so severe a trial.

The intense coldness of the water made itself felt all over him from head to foot.

His limbs were as insensible as they could have been had they been severed from him.

With chattering teeth, he murmured:

"Will they find me here? Is this to be the ignoble end of my career—caught here underground, like a rat in a hole? That would be a triumph for my enemies indeed. And yet how can I help it? Even if the bucket was now at the bottom my paralysed limbs would not allow me to climb; the rope would be quite useless to me."

He was silent for a moment, and then, in tones of greater determination, he said:

"I can at least save myself from the humiliation of falling into the hands of my foes. I can die here—that will baffle them."

It required, however, no ordinary amount of stoicism to decide upon this course without acting upon it; and though Dick spoke the words we have recorded, yet he anxiously and restlessly looked around and moved about in the hope of being able to find some means of emerging.

This restlessness had at least one good effect—it stimulated the languid circulation of his blood; but so far from meeting with the slightest success, the unpleasant truth was more and more forcibly pressed upon him that escape was wholly and utterly impossible.

Dick had thought his forced sojourn in the hollow of the old tree unendurable enough, yet how delightful was it when contrasted with his present situation!

And all the time he kept his hearing on full stretch, partly because he fancied that the officers would return, but in reality still more so in the hope that he should hear some one approaching with the intention of drawing water from the well.

The very unlikelihood of any person coming for this purpose at such a late hour of the night only shows how slight a thing will serve as a hold for hope to seize upon and cling to.

But minute after minute elapsed without any sound occurring to break the intense stillness.

"I am in for a night of it at all events," Dick said at length, assuming as much resignation as he was able. "For how much longer, who can tell?"

The conviction that there was no chance of his being able to escape for several hours to come made him cast about for some means by which he could render his position a little less uncomfortable than it was.

This, as may be easily imagined, was no easy matter, especially when we remember the benumbed condition of his limbs.

Nevertheless, after many fruitless efforts, he contrived to draw himself up in such a way that he supported himself above the surface of the water.

He did this by pressing his feet tightly against one side and his back against the other.

Such a position as this, however, was fatiguing to the last degree, still it was preferable to remaining in the water.

Thus the time passed till morning came.

Looking up, Dick could see the change gradually taking place in the colour of the little bit of sky visible to him, until at length it was fairly daylight.

And when this time arrived he seemed as far off escape as ever, for the silence gave no signs of being broken.

He was now in a most commiserable state, and seemingly all but deprived of the use of his limbs.

His long listening, though, was at length rewarded.

Footsteps first of all became audible.

Then voices.

Were the speakers coming to the well?

That was the question which Dick asked himself with feverish anxiousness.

His suspense was not destined to be of long duration.

Nearer and nearer they came, until they paused at the top.

By the sound of the voices, Dick could tell that they were two men.

"Now, then—look sharp!" said one. "Down with the bucket!"

A clattering sound immediately followed, and the bucket was lowered into the well.

Dick fixed his eyes upon it anxiously.

Would these men, after having drawn the water they required, lower the bucket into the well again?

They might do so, but there were so many chances that they would not, that before the bucket had accomplished half the descent Dick had determined not to run the risk.

"No, no!" he muttered. "I have stayed here long enough. At all ventures, I must be off. The police officers I have little doubt are far enough off by this, and I can easily show myself more than a match for these two fellows, even if they should try to molest me, which is more than doubtful."

Just as he pronounced the last words the bucket reached the water.

As quickly as his stiffened joints would permit, Dick seized the rope, placed his feet on the edge of the bucket, and waited to be drawn up.

So much horror had he of any longer continuance there that it is open to question whether he would not have made the ascent even had he been certain that his resolute foe, Mr. Skellum, was at the top waiting for him.

"This bucket seems a devil of a weight this morning, Bill!" were the next words that reached Dick's ears. "What is the meaning of it?"

"Oh, pull away—I can feel no difference."

The dismal creaking of the windlass followed, and Dick Turpin comprehended that there was a man at either side winding up, for the windlass was furnished with two handles.

The strain was, of course, very considerable, and much greater than it was under ordinary circumstances.

Yet they tugged away with hearty goodwill.

"I'll be d—d!" said the one who had spoken first on the former occasion—"I'll be d—d if there is not something in the bucket! Just you look and see."

"Oh, go on! If there is we shall know when it gets to the top, and that will be soon enough."

While the men stood turning the handles, it was impossible for them to see down into the well.

But the second one began to realise at last how much greater the weight was that morning than it was ordinarily.

"It gets heavier and heavier," he said. "What is it?"

"Wait till it gets to the top," cried the other, as though glad of this chance of retaliation.

But all the rope was now almost wound up.

Creak—creak went the clumsy wooden frame, as though protesting against being called upon to sustain so great a weight.

Suddenly, one of them, turning aside, caught sight of Dick's head and shoulders.

The suddenness with which he caught sight of this unexpected apparition terrified him to such a degree that he lost all command over himself.

Uttering the most hideous yell which it is possible to conceive as coming from any human throat, he let go of the handle.

His companion, startled at the sound, turned his head.

At the same time he was not prepared for bearing all the weight himself, and without knowing precisely how it occurred, the handle slipped out of his hand also.

Some very remarkable events ensued in consequence.

They took place, as one may say, simultaneously, and the space of time altogether occupied by them certainly did not exceed a couple of seconds at the very most.

But we must describe them separately, and to do so will occupy several lines.

In the first place, then, the man who had first let go of the windlass handle received a sudden blow on the bridge of his nose, and so great was the force of it that it sent him flying backwards, as though shot.

The other, who had the handle snatched from his grasp by the unexpected strain, received a tremendous blow under the chin, which caused him to give vent to a loud scream of agony, and fall back also.

These two blows were delivered by the stout iron handles of the windlass, and the force of them may be gathered from the fact that it was Dick's weight added to that of the bucket of water which caused them to revolve.

They went round with the rapidity of lightning, and it would have been quite impossible to avoid the blows.

As for Dick Turpin, he achieved the descent of the well in a much less space of time than it had taken him on the previous occasion.

The lower he went of course the greater was his speed, and he reached the bottom with such a sudden shock that for the moment all his breath was shaken out of him.

"D—n the fools!" he cried, wrathfully, as soon as he could recover the use of his voice.

But he became immediately conscious that he had spoken with imprudent loudness, and he became silent accordingly.

A succession of most dismal groans then reached his ears.

The two men were both severely hurt.

After a minute or two, however, they both contrived to rise to their feet.

The one then cursed the other most soundly for being such a fool as to let go, and then, groaning again, they retired, probably to seek the hall to obtain some attention to their hurts.

"Now is my time, or never," said Dick, with resolution. "If I am quick, all will be well. But when they get to the kitchen they will have such a tale to tell about what they have seen in the well, that all the inmates of the place will be brought here by curiosity; and what would become of me then?"

But Dick was very doubtful as to whether he possessed the amount of strength requisite to enable him to climb the rope.

Had not the performance of this feat been of such extreme importance, it is quite certain that he would never have attempted it.

The certainty of how much he had to lose if he failed enabled him to make wonderful efforts.

Little by little he ascended.

He had to rest very many times; but he did not so much regret this, because he was conscious that each time he gained new strength.

The fact was, as he grew warmer by the exertion he recovered more and more his lost powers.

In much less time than he was aware of the top was gained.

Before venturing to emerge he raised his head just a very little above the brickwork, and looked carefully around.

Satisfied by one glance that the coast was clear, he, with all the quickness of which he was capable, stepped out and made a rush towards the building in order to conceal himself.

He was only just in time, for from another direction to that which, most fortunately for himself, he had taken, Sir Humphrey Yeomans and a whole army of his servants appeared

As may be supposed, they were all in a state of tremendous excitement, while the baronet himself seemed to be making frantic but ineffectual attempts to receive something like a lucid explanation of what had occurred.

The man who had been struck under the jaw had received so much injury that his neck and jaws had already swelled to more than treble their usual size.

In consequence of this he could only make an extraordinary inarticulate sound, which just enabled his hearers to surmise that he had seen something very dreadful indeed, and no more.

As for the other, his eyes had swelled up to such a degree that vision to him was as much an impossibility as speech was to his companion.

He was led by two of his fellow-servants.

"It's the devil, your worship!" he kept bawling at the top of his voice. "The devil is down the well! I am certain of it, because I seed him!"

This alone would he say.

All attempts to obtain any more detailed account were fruitless.

In vain, also, was it to endeavour to stop his clamour.

Dick waited to observe no more, but withdrew, in order to seize upon the present opportunity of concealing himself.

The chance was such a one as would not occur again.

But Dick was not a little perplexed when he tried to decide which would be the best course of action for him to adopt.

He wanted to get away from the Hall altogether, and yet not unless he could take with him the tools which he came purposely to fetch.

And then it was broad daylight—a most unfavourable time for him to think of setting about his task of digging a grave for his mare.

"No," he said, "I must hide myself somewhere here till nightfall, and then beyond a doubt I shall be able to carry out my intention. But it must be no ordinary place of concealment, for, ten to one, suspicion will point to me as being the person hidden in the well, and the cause of so much alarm. Where, then, can I bestow myself?"

The building which afforded Dick this temporary shelter consisted of some outoffices connected with the Hall.

The fugitive looked keenly at the noble dwelling.

"That is the place," he said, nodding his head. "In there surely there are chambers never used and rarely looked into; and, such being the case, cannot I find some nook or corner where I can remain unseen for a few hours? Yes, that will be the place. I fancy they will scarcely give me credit for being bold enough to hide in the very Hall itself."

It did indeed indicate great boldness upon Turpin's part, or he would never have thought of such a thing.

But his mind was quite made up, and so, without any delay, he crept along the walls of the outbuildings to one particular window which at once attracted his attention.

This window was one of those often seen in country houses.

It opened inwardly, like a door, thus forming a ready means of access to the lawn and flower garden.

It now also formed as ready a means for Dick to obtain access to the interior, and he hastened to avail himself of it.

He was not aware of the circumstance, but the reader may as well be told that this window communicated with the breakfast-room where Sir Humphrey had been sitting, just about to commence his morning meal, when the unparalleled uproar in the kitchen reached him.

He had opened the window and passed through it because that was the readiest mode of exit, and in his hurry he forgot to close it.

Little did he think that the next person that would step through it into his room would be the much-dreaded fugitive, Dick Turpin.

CHAPTER MCX.

DICK TURPIN IS CONCEALED IN A WARDROBE BY THE DAUGHTER OF SIR HUMPHREY YEOMANS.

SUCH, however, proved to be the case.

A moment's inspection satisfied Dick that externally the coast was clear, and internally that the room was unoccupied.

This favourable conjunction of circumstances he looked upon as an augury that after all he was to be successful.

The interior of the Hall was profoundly still—so still that Dick began to think that all the inmates must, without any exception, have turned out to see what was the matter at the well.

A huge wood fire was burning in this breakfast-room, diffusing a warmth which was to Dick delightful in the extreme.

On the table, too, were spread substantial delicacies, the bare sight of which forcibly reminded him that a long time had elapsed since he had eaten anything.

To remove any article from the table would only have been to make his presence known, and this enabled him to restrain himself.

On a kind of sideboard, however, were several beautiful cut-glass decanters

One containing brandy.

No sooner did Dick perceive this than, regardless of all consequences, he seized upon it, put the neck to his lips, and drank heartily.

Then, carefully replacing the decanter where he had found it, he prepared himself for action, being fully conscious that he had lost time enough already.

"They will never miss that," he said, smacking his lips; "and if they do, it will doubtless be set down to one of the servants. But it has done me a world of good. I begin to feel as though I had blood in my veins now."

While making this reflection, he looked well around the room.

But not only did it present evident traces of having recently been occupied, but it held out no chances of concealment whatever.

Dick opened a door cautiously and peeped out.

He discovered that it communicated with the main entrance-hall of the building.

He crossed the threshold and closed the door.

Then he advanced slowly, peering everywhere, until he was startled by hearing a footstep not far off.

It was approaching.

Where was he to go?

Just in front of him was the staircase, and up this, after a brief pause of consideration, he bounded, two steps at the time.

He reached the angle of the stairs only just in time, for as he did so the footstep could be heard upon the flagstones below.

Who it might be Dick did not venture to attempt to ascertain.

Indeed, all his faculties were required in looking about him, for he could not tell how suddenly some door or other might open and cause his discovery.

On the landing above, however, the silence was as great as it could have been in any uninhabited dwelling.

From this landing several dark and narrow corridors branched off, apparently forming the means of communication between the various rooms.

Dick chose what he thought was the darkest and narrowest passage of all, and darted down it with a rapid step.

There was no need to tread with any excess of caution, for the thick carpet with which the floor was covered effectually deadened any ordinary sound.

All at once, however, the end of this passage was gained, and Dick Turpin found himself standing upon another landing, which was lighted by a magnificent stained-glass window, and as the sun happened to be shining upon it, its appearance was very beautiful indeed.

His admiration prevented him from noticing so soon as he should have done the opening of one of the doors near to him.

On the threshold appeared a vision of loveliness ten thousand times more bewildering than the stained-glass window.

She was tastefully attired in a light morning wrapper, and was about to cross the landing when she caught sight of the form of a stranger.

She arrested her steps at once, and uttered a loud shriek, then suddenly darted towards the staircase.

All this occurred with so much rapidity that Dick, in spite of his usual self-possession, was not a little bewildered.

But he recovered himself sufficiently to spring forward and seize the young girl.

He saw that she was about to scream again, and so he quickly, and yet with as much gentleness as possible, placed his hand over her mouth.

"Unless the Hall is more generally deserted than I take it to be," he muttered, "that shriek will discover me. However, I will take care not to throw any chance away."

As he pronounced these words he stooped a little, lifted the young girl in his arms, and, despite her struggles, bore her rapidly towards the door from which she had just emerged.

Having done so, he closed it with his foot, and then, in as calm a voice as he was able to command, he said:

"I ask ten thousand pardons for my rudeness, lady, but what I did has only been done from dire necessity and in self-defence. Believe me—pray believe me when I say that you have nothing whatever to fear—no ground at all for apprehension. Not for worlds would I do you the least injury; but I appeal to you by all you hold sacred and dear to be silent, and to listen to what I have to say If you will promise this I will release you."

Dick spoke rapidly, but nevertheless his words were most impressive.

The young girl looked at him closely, and saw an expression upon his face which made her resolve to trust him.

Dick could read her thoughts as though they had been written before him, and in consequence removed his hand.

"I promise," she said, faintly.

But she was calm and collected, exhibiting no other sign of terror than that her gaze was fixed and stony-looking.

"It is well," said Turpin. "My life now is in your hands—I trust entirely in your word. I do so, because I know that I can do so safely."

The young girl did not reply, but gazed at Dick as though she did not exactly comprehend the actual state of affairs.

It was then, with his head bent, and in a voice whose mournfulness went straight to her heart, that Dick said:

"Lady, I admit that in the course of my life I have done much which is wrong—much which makes me liable to the last penalty of the law. Do not shrink from me—I will not harm you; nor have I ever done the least harm to those you may hold dear. Under these circumstances I ask you for protection—I ask you to save me."

"Save you?" she echoed, more and more surprised.

"Yes, save me; for if you do not conceal me, I shall be taken and afterwards hanged. You draw back with unfeigned horror—that serves to strengthen my conviction that one so fair and gentle as you are would not even by these indirect means bring about my death."

"Not for worlds—not for worlds!"

"Heaven bless you, lady, for that assurance! I knew ere you spoke you possessed a kindly heart."

"But how can I save you?"

"Hush—oh, hush!"

Both became silent, and listened.

Tap—tap—tap!

Some one was knocking gently upon the panel of the door.

"Miss Milly—Miss Milly," said a voice, "was that you? Did you scream, or did you hear some one?"

Dick made a sign which signified plainly enough that the girl—no doubt the lady's own waiting-maid—was to be answered and dismissed.

"Martha, is that you?"

"Yes, miss. Can I come in?"

"No—no," answered Milly, for so we may as well call her.

There was no fear that she would be able to enter, for at the first intimation of danger, Dick had glided noiselessly over the carpet to the door.

"But did you scream, miss?"

"Yes—yes."

"Oh dear! what is the matter?"

"Nothing—nothing. Leave me now. I will come down directly."

"Very well, miss. Only I thought as you screamed you must have been frightened; and we have all been terrified to death, for there has some dreadful thing been seen in the well. Leastways, something horrible jumped out of the old well in the garden, miss, and it struck Ritson, the groom, on the face and blinded him, besides breaking his nose; and the new stable-boy, he struck him on the mouth, and has broken his jaw, and his neck has swelled up so that he cannot speak."

This information was poured forth with that glibness of utterance for which the female sex is remarkable.

A shade of alarm came over the young girl's face.

It would have been much more serious than it was had she not noticed that Dick received the intelligence with a smile, which seemed to say that the report was exaggerated, and that he knew all about it.

"I am all right," answered Milly. "Please say I shall be down directly, when I shall be glad to hear all about this; and tell papa I should have been down to breakfast earlier only my head ached so very badly."

"Yes, miss."

The girl retired.

Dick advanced, and, bowing low, he said:

"Dear lady, you have now given an assurance of your wish and your intention to save me. I know that the idea of handing me over to the power of my enemies would be too terrible a one for you to entertain. You will protect me, will you not?—you will save me, will you not?"

The young girl burst out into tears, and sank down upon a chair a prey to the deepest anguish.

This was something for which Dick was hardly prepared.

Wondering much what could have called forth these expressions of grief, he stood still watching her, knowing full well that this course would be the best.

At length he spoke.

"What is it I have done?" he asked—"what unfortunate act or speech of mine has been the cause of this great grief?"

"Alas—alas!"

"Speak—speak—pray speak!"

"What have I done," she murmured—"what have I done? What may I not suffer from this imprudence? I have had you here—here, in my own chamber, and have not denounced your presence! Should you now be seen, what will become of me—what will be said?"

"You are right," answered Dick, touched by her deep distress. "The thought never once occurred to me. If it had, I would never have compromised you. As it is, I shall thank you deeply and sincerely, and rid you of all further peril."

"What—oh, what would you do?" she added, imploringly, perceiving that Dick stepped towards the door.

"Do?" he iterated. "Why, relieve you of my presence, and so put an end to your embarrassment."

"No, no—ten thousand times no! I will never, never consent to that! What is done cannot be undone; but it seems it still lies in my power to save you."

"But I cannot accept even my life at the price of your fair fame. No, no. Think not of me; I am not worthy of your consideration."

The young girl wept bitterly still; but she had left her chair, and now stood tearful, pale, and trembling, with her back to the room door.

"Here," she said, "you will be safe; and if you are not seen I shall lose nothing, while you have everything to gain. It was selfish and wrong of me to be so ready in putting my own possible danger so quickly forward."

"That I can never allow," responded Dick, "for the selfishness is on my part; but in my haste I never gave it a thought that you might be a sufferer by lending me your aid; had I done so, I repeat, the request would never, never have passed my lips."

"I believe you," she said, gently. "And now let that pass. I know you not, save that you say you are in danger. If it lies in my power I will save you from all harm."

"How feeble and how weak are thanks!" said Dick, in a voice full of emotion. "Fain would I express my gratitude to you, but——"

"Enough—enough! I will leave you now, and there is no reason for anyone to know that we have met."

"Not a word respecting this meeting shall ever pass my lips—I will pledge you my sacred word of that."

"I am satisfied."

"But," said Dick, "are you satisfied that in your absence no one will enter the room?"

"I will lock the door."

"Are you in the habit of doing so?"

"No. Why?"

"Because if you are not, and your door should be found fastened, suspicion would be roused at once."

"True—true! I am distracted!"

"Let me think for you," said Dick, "for in securing my safety I am also securing yours."

"What do you propose?"

"Is not that a wardrobe yonder?" asked Dick, pointing while he spoke to a huge and massive piece of antique furniture.

"It is. Why?"

Dick went towards it, and turning the key, which was in the lock, opened the centre door.

A good-sized closet was then disclosed, which contained only a few articles of apparel at the back.

"This is the very thing."

The young girl looked at him in wonder.

"Look," he said—"I will put a double trust in you. I will enter here—thus."

He suited the action to the word.

"Now," he said, "you shall close this door, lock it, and take away the key. If you like you can betray me—I shall then be wholly at your mercy."

The young girl made an angry, impatient gesture.

"Pardon me for making mention of such a thing. I know full well you would not be guilty of such treachery. Do not doubt my words, for I am ready and anxious to prove them by my actions."

"I do not doubt them."

"Enough, then. When you have locked the door, keep good charge of the key—do not let it go out of your possession."

"I promise that. But what am I to do then?"

"When night comes, let me out, and I will make my escape. There shall be no clumsiness about it. You will never hear of me again after this night."

The young girl sighed heavily.

"Carry out my instructions," said Dick, with much earnestness, "and all will be well. Lock the door now and descend, or wonder may be excited by your delay. If you are asked why you screamed, make what excuse you can, and do not come near this room again until the time comes for you to release me."

With a heavy, aching heart, the young girl promised compliance with his mandates, and locked the door.

Bitterly indeed did she reproach herself for having so readily given way at first to the feelings of compassion for Dick's position which instantly rose in her breast.

The consequences to her might be serious indeed.

But she had gone too far to retract, and the idea of giving up the fugitive to his foes was most abhorrent to her nature.

She felt that she could never do it.

"I will save him if I can," she murmured, as she descended the stairs slowly and very differently to her usual manner; "but I am afraid I shall unconsciously betray him."

On descending to the breakfast parlour, she found the baronet in a state of great perplexity and fury, for all his efforts to come to something like a clear conception of what had taken place at the well had proved unavailing.

His lady was also there, and both were struck at the first glance with the change which was visible in the appearance of their daughter.

But having been already informed of her indisposition, they attributed the alteration to this cause.

The circumstance, too, attracted less attention than it would have done on any other occasion in consequence of the exciting nature of the events that had taken place that morning.

So preoccupied, however, was Milly, that not even the extraordinary narrative could fix her attention.

Little, however, did the baronet imagine the subject of his only daughter's thoughts.

Dick Turpin, meanwhile, locked up in the wardrobe in the manner described, felt more and more uncomfortable the longer he reflected upon his situation.

He was perfectly certain that in an ordinary way Milly was quite guiltless of all deceit, and therefore he feared, and not unreasonably, that her very anxiety to keep his secret would lead to a disclosure.

"I must once more resign myself to circumstances," he said. "I have not much to complain about at present. If I could only sleep, now, it would refresh me, and make me ready for the adventures of to-night. I will try, for I shall be just as safe here sleeping or waking."

A great feeling of drowsiness had been creeping over Dick for some time past, and he yielded to its influence.

Indeed, he was not able to withstand its power.

This might have been caused by the confined space he was in; and then it must be remembered that an unusually long period had elapsed since he had enjoyed anything like a good sleep.

The wardrobe, too, one would have thought an uncomfortable place to sleep in, but it served well enough for the weary and exhausted fugitive.

In a few minutes he was in a deep slumber, which for a time made him oblivious of all the perils and perplexities of his existence.

How long he might have remained in this state of unconsciousness he could not possibly determine, but all at once his ears caught the sound of voices.

His first thought was that he was dreaming of what had lately happened, for it was Milly's voice which first struck upon his ears.

With a vague sensation of interest, Dick listened, and as he did so he recovered all his faculties, for he found himself threatened by an imminent danger.

"Now, mamma," were the first words he distinguished clearly, "do tell me why you have so insisted upon coming up into my room with me?"

"You do not object to that, surely, do you?" And Dick fancied that there seemed to be an indication of suspicion in the tones.

"Oh, no—no, mamma! What ever made you think that I did? I was only curious, you know. It is such an unusual thing for you to come up with me."

"Oh, is it? Well, you surprise me. Let me see, this makes the fourth time I have been here during the past week."

"Oh yes—yes—I know—I know," stammered Milly, with fast-increasing confusion. "But my headache is so distracting that I do not know what I am saying, and coming upstairs seems to have made it ten times worse."

"I don't think you do know what you are saying," was the reply; "and you seem to me to have a—a—well, I may as well say it—a remarkably guilty air."

"Oh, mamma!"

"Well, well, don't distress yourself, only you seem ill at ease, as though you had a secret weighing on your mind; but perhaps it is your headache—at any rate, I won't bother you about it now. Let it be; we will talk it over another time."

Rather a long pause followed.

In his mind's eye he could see the lady looking keenly at her daughter, and waiting for her to reply.

But finding no reply came, she continued:

"I came up, my dear, merely because I thought I should like to see that crimson velvet dress your papa bought you such a long time ago, and which you seem to have such an objection to wearing."

"Why—why, mamma——" faltered Milly.

"Oh, I want none of your excuses," was the reply. "I am well aware that you took a fanciful dislike to that dress, and that it is the hardest matter in the world to get you to wear it."

"But, mamma——"

"Hush, I say! You know how very fond your papa is of that dress, and how much he wants you to wear it; and he has been very cross about it this morning. What put it into his head I don't know, without he expects some visitor here to-morrow, before whom he wishes you to appear to every advantage."

"Oh, mamma!" ejaculated Milly, in so stifled a voice that Dick fancied she must be fainting.

"What's the matter with you, girl—what is it you have oppressing your mind so much?"

"N-nothing, mamma."

"Oh, nonsense! I am sure there is, and I am determined to find it out! But one thing at a time. Let me see this crimson velvet dress."

"Not to-day, mamma—not to-day."

"Why not?"

"Let it be to-morrow! Anything but now!"

"For what reason?"

"Because—because," stammered Milly, with increasing distress and confusion—"because my head aches so badly. Oh, mamma," she added, with a gush of tears, "you don't know how ill I feel!"

"Something is the matter with you, I am sure. However, I can't think you are so bad as not to be able to find me the dress. It is hanging in the wardrobe, is it not?"

These words at once let Dick understand what was the cause of Milly's extreme embarrassment.

At the same time he was conscious that something was touching him, which by the feel was certainly velvet.

No doubt it was the velvet dress just spoken of.

Dick now felt ten times more uncomfortable than he had yet done, and listened with the greatest intentness to all that might follow.

In his own mind he gave himself up for discovered.

Not that he imagined Milly would betray his hiding-place, but she would manifest so much uneasiness that her mother's suspicions would be unappeasably excited.

To the interrogation as to the whereabouts of the velvet dress Milly made no reply until her mother repeated her words.

It was then in a faint, almost inarticulate whisper she pronounced the one word:

"Yes."

Before she gave the reply, her mother had quitted her seat and walked towards the wardrobe.

Dick heard her coming and held his breath.

Another moment or two would put the matter of his discovery beyond all doubt or question.

His hearing was preternaturally acute—indeed, every one of his faculties seemed sharpened by the imminence of his present danger—and he could hear Milly drawing her breath in short and fitful respirations.

"Where's the key?" were the next words.

The question was an ominous one.

Dick wondered what reply Milly would make to it.

She was silent.

"Where is the key, child?" asked her mother, with additional sternness.

"Is—is—is it not—not in the lock, mamma?"

"Of course not," was the sharp rejoinder; "if it had been do you think I should have asked you for it?"

"It is very strange," said Milly, making a desperate effort to retain what little composure she had left—"very strange, indeed! The key ought to be in the lock."

"I know that—but it isn't. And I ask you where it is?"

"Let me call Martha, mamma—I daresay she will know. Oh, my poor, poor head, I believe I am half distracted!"

"I begin to think so too," said her mother, who began to be more puzzled and alarmed than before. "However, there is some mystery in connection with the velvet dress, and I will have it fathomed."

Milly uttered a faint scream.

At this juncture a faint tapping was heard.

"What's that?"

"I don't know, mamma."

"It's me, miss, if you please," said a voice outside the door.

"That's Martha," cried the baronet's wife, as she stepped hastily across the room; "now we shall find out something more, I have no doubt."

Her voice was full of triumph, and indicated anticipated satisfaction.

Milly now gave herself up in despair.

And so did Dick.

The former was in mortal dread of the consequences of this adventure, and felt the most intense longing conceivable for the floor to open and swallow her, never to let her be seen on earth again.

As for Dick, he awaited the result with more calmness than anyone could have conceived.

He knew what was the worst that could happen to him, and he was collected and prepared accordingly.

CHAPTER MCXI.

DICK TURPIN HAS SOME ODD ADVENTURES BEFORE LEAVING THE HALL.

At this moment the door opened.

Martha entered.

"I want the key of this wardrobe," said the baronet's lady, somewhat sharply. "Where is it?"

"The what, my lady?"

"The key of the wardrobe."

"It's in the lock, my lady."

"No it is not," was the still sharper rejoinder, for the coincident manner in which both fenced with the question gave rise to still greater suspicions.

But the cause of Martha's hesitation was, that she had taken upon herself to secrete in the wardrobe some letters she had received, and her guilty conscience her jump to the conclusion that her mistress had heard about the matter and come to look for the epistles.

[DICK TURPIN DIGS A GRAVE FOR BLACK BESS.]

The angry manner of her mistress still more embarrassed and confused her.

"It is very strange," said Lady Yeomans, glancing from one to the other of the guilty pair. "It's very odd indeed, but I will not rest until the mystery is settled. Once more I say, where is the key?"

"I assure you, my lady," said the trembling Martha, "I don't know. It is always left in the door, and if it is not there now I am certain I can't tell where it is."

"It is not there now," was the stern answer; "and I insist upon it being found without any further delay!"

Milly screamed again, and all but fainted.

"One of you must know something about it. No one has been here but yourselves. Give up the key at once, without any more prevarication, or you will find that I shall be very angry indeed."

A dead silence followed.

It was broken very abruptly by Martha.

"Oh, my lady! if you please I was sent up to tell you something, only I was so flustered that it went clean out of my head."

"Sent to me? By whom?"

"Sir Humphrey, my lady. He is down in the Red Room, and wants to see you this very moment about something very particular."

"What is it?"

"I don't know, my lady; but he seems terribly put out about something, and was walking up and down from the window to the door for all the world like a lion."

"And he said I was to come to him immediately?"

"Yes, my lady."

Her mistress hesitated.

Her desire to clear up the present mystery was about the strongest feeling she had had for a long time, and no ordinary circumstance could have turned her aside from it.

But such a message from the baronet as Martha had just delivered was not to be neglected.

She knew the impatient disposition of her husband well, and had long enough ago learned the wisdom of not offering the least opposition to him.

Her hesitation only lasted about a moment, yet during that brief space of time many reflections passed through her mind.

Her fear was that during her absence Martha and her daughter might consult together about the mystery which evidently existed; and she knew Martha well enough to dread that she would be defeated if this conference took place.

"You shall come with me, Martha," she said. "I shall not be more than a moment, I daresay; and then I will come back and have the key of the wardrobe found."

The change which took place in the expression of Martha's countenance was quite enough recompense to the lady, and she felicitated herself not a little upon her cleverness and penetration.

"Stay where you are, miss!" she said to her daughter; "and rest assured I shall be back again in a few moments at the furthest."

With these words, she quitted the chamber, insisting that Martha should precede her, in order that no signals should be exchanged.

When the door closed, Dick waited while perhaps he could have counted ten.

Then with his finger-nails he tapped very lightly and gently against the panel of the wardrobe.

"Hist, hist!" he said, in a faint whisper, placing his mouth close to the keyhole. "Find out whether they have descended the stairs; and if so, let me out."

But Milly did not move.

Dick grew uneasy.

Had she fainted?

He tapped again, and this time with more loudness.

No one can tell what a relief it was to him when he heard the young girl's trembling voice.

"What is it? Oh, what shall I do?"

"See if they have descended."

In her agitated condition she had some difficulty in comprehending what was said to her.

But she went to the door, and peeped out.

Then returning quickly, she said:

"They have gone."

"Open the door, then, and let me out."

"But what will you do?"

"No matter. Release me."

Milly trembled so excessively that she could scarcely draw the key from her pocket.

But at last she did so, and the wardrobe was unlocked.

Dick was in a fever of impatience, and stepped forth hastily.

Then, without delaying time by saying a word, he locked the door again and placed the key upon the dressing-table.

"There!" he said "If you are asked, you can say you were too confused to think where it was before, or that your head distracted you."

But Milly at this trying moment gave evidence of the pure unselfishness of her disposition, for she said, in earnest, anxious tones:

"Never mind me; but tell me what you will do? How will you escape discovery?"

"Leave that to me," said Dick, with easy assurance. "Rest assured, though, that I will compromise you no longer; I regret deeply having done so to the extent I have already, and that I should have caused you not only so much distress of mind, but also been the means of rousing your mother's suspicions against you."

"Think not of that, but say what you will do. I cannot tell how soon she may return."

Dick went first to the window and looked out.

At a considerable distance beneath him could be seen a yard, where a man was busy attending to a whole army of dogs.

He shrank back.

Then going rapidly to the door of Milly's room, he opened it and listened.

Some sounds came from below, but they were distant ones and not of a character to excite any apprehensions in his breast.

With eager eyes, Dick looked everywhere around him, hoping to perceive some place that held out some little prospect of concealing him.

He saw nothing, and therefore, though most unwillingly, he was compelled to call upon the trembling girl for her assistance.

"Do you know of any nook or corner," he asked, "where I can dispose of myself till nightfall? Surely there must be many such about a building like this one. If you will point out a hiding-place, I promise to take my departure in silence and in peace."

"Alas!" replied Milly, clasping her hands, while her face assumed an expression of intense fright—"alas! I know of no such place as you require. What—oh! what is to be done?"

"Hush—hush!" cried Dick, quietly, "there is no need for alarm. Tell me of some one apartment in the Hall that is but little used—some room where you do not think it likely anyone will enter to-day."

"My thoughts forsake or bewilder me," she said, pressing her hands over her temples. "Yet stay, there is one place—yes, I think I may say there is one place."

"What is it?"

"The library."

"The library?" echoed Dick.

"Yes—that is the apartment least of all visited by anyone save myself. There you may chance to find the shelter which you seek."

"Thanks—thanks! I have no doubt, from what you have just said, that the library will be, of all others, the place to suit me."

"Yes—yes. It is one of the rarest things in the world for my father to cross the threshold of that chamber."

"No doubt—no doubt. But how am I to find it?"

"In that I do not think there will be the slightest difficulty."

"You can direct me easily, then?"

"I can—I can. When you reach the bottom of the staircase you will see a door almost opposite to you."

"Is that it?"

"It is."

"Then I cannot fail to find it. Once more, many—many thanks for all that you have done in my behalf!"

"Name it no more."

She started at the moment, for, just as she spoke, the violent slamming of a door was heard.

"That's father," she gasped—"I am sure it is!"

"How can you tell?" asked Dick, curiously.

"Because no one else in the house slams a door like that."

"Oh!"

Dick listened, but a most profound silence ensued.

"Do you think I may venture to descend?" he asked, at last.

"I think so; but oh, be careful—pray be careful!"

"I will, depend upon it; and my only hope now is that ere long I shall be permitted the opportunity of doing something for you which will in part requite what you have done for me."

"No more—no more!"

Like a shadow, Dick stole to the top of the staircase.

Leaning over the massive carved baluster, he peered down.

But, so far as he could tell, no one was near.

"Farewell!" he said, in a whisper, which nevertheless was expressive of his deep gratitude—"farewell, should we not meet again; but rest assured that I shall never—never forget you. You are inclined to think but lightly of it, yet, believe me, you have done no less than save my life."

The young girl did not speak.

But she made a half-imploring, half-commanding gesture, which Dick at once understood.

In obedience to it he inclined his head and commenced a rapid descent of the staircase, for this was what Milly wished him to do without more delay.

But rapid as were his movements, they nevertheless were characterised by the utmost caution.

He did not know how soon some one might appear, and in the event of the occurrence of such a circumstance it was imperative that he should be early acquainted with it.

The thick carpet with which the stairs were covered enabled him to tread noiselessly, so that there was no fear of an alarm being raised in consequence of this.

Just as he was about to turn the first angle he heard voices.

He ventured to take a hasty glance.

He caught sight of Martha and her mistress.

They were ascending.

By this it would seem that her interview with the baronet was over.

What was Turpin to do now?

To descend unseen by those who were coming up was of course impossible.

To remain standing where he was would only be to ensure his discovery.

There was no place near that offered a chance of concealment even to a mouse.

Clearly there was but one resource—it was, to ascend again.

He did so with great swiftness and silence, though as he neared the top he was filled with the dread that Milly, on seeing him thus unexpectedly return, would give utterance to some cry which, at the very least, would have the effect of increasing her mother's suspicions.

But, to his infinite satisfaction, he found, on reaching the landing-place, that she had retired to her own chamber.

At any rate, she was nowhere to be seen.

This danger being at an end, Dick grew more hopeful.

Crossing the landing, he opened the first door which presented itself.

Crossing the threshold, he found himself in a small bed-room, which had certainly not been very long unoccupied.

However, it was empty now, and that was enough for Dick.

Although the door was closed, the voices of Martha and her mistress were borne to his ears, though he could not distinguish what was said.

He listened intently, until a door was shut somewhat violently, and the voices ceased.

"Surely—surely," muttered Dick, "I may now venture to say that the coast is clear. Yet, before I leave this place, let me consider whether it will be wise to do so."

He stepped further into the room while he spoke.

The window he found commanded a view of the yard where the baronet's dogs were kept, so that it was quite out of the question to hope for escape in that direction.

Then, the bed-room itself was only furnished with just such articles of furniture as were indispensable, and no more.

Not the least chance of concealment presented itself.

Having gained this knowledge, Dick made his way towards the door again.

"It will never do to remain here," he said, to himself—"that would be running by far too much risk. The library—yes, that, of all others, is the place for me. The old baronet is no reader, I will be bound, nor his wife either. Milly, and Milly only, is in the habit of repairing there. At all hazards, I will go down to the library."

Now, had Turpin only known it, he was perfectly safe where he was, nor could he have done better than remain there.

It was only natural, however, that he should fear that some one would enter before the day was over.

Accordingly he opened the door.

All was once more still.

Again he glided to the top of the staircase.

Again he descended.

In less than a moment the bottom was reached.

He then found himself again in the entrance-hall, and not far off he could perceive the stairs by which he had ascended.

The one at the foot of which he now stood seemed a secondary or more private one.

The object which attracted Dick's attention, however, was the large and massive-looking oaken door in front of him.

This, beyond doubt, communicated with the library.

In spite of what Milly had said Dick felt a strong disinclination to open this door.

The deep silence which reigned, however, inspired him with confidence.

Three strides took him to the mat outside the door.

Placing his hand upon the knob, he turned it very carefully

The lock was well oiled, and gave forth no sound.

Then, with the same gentleness, he pushed open the door and glided in.

No sooner had he done so, however, than he wished himself safely out again.

But it was too late, and finding such to be the case, so far from attempting his escape, he swiftly closed the door and turned the key in the lock.

Contrary to all expectation, he found himself face to face with Sir Humphrey Yeomans.

The baronet was seated at a small writing-table, and had a newspaper spread out before him.

So softly had Dick opened the door that he had never heard him, nor did he become aware of his presence until Dick fairly stood within the apartment.

The emergency was one which well tested the highwayman's presence of mind.

Although startled for a second or so, he never doubted which was the right course for him to pursue.

The baronet had seen him.

This being so, if he had beat a precipitate retreat Sir Humphrey would instantly have raised such an alarm as would have made it quite an impossibility for him to escape undetected.

Difficult as it seemed, it was nevertheless necessary that he should compel the baronet to be silent.

But how?

Dick had not determined.

Action was so necessary that it left him no leisure for further thought.

The unexpected appearance of Dick so startled the baronet at first that he neither moved nor spoke, but simply sat with his mouth open and his eyes glaring wildly over the top of his spectacles.

Dick stepped swiftly forward for a few paces, and then spoke.

"Sir Humphrey," he said, in a low and determined voice, "I mean you no harm—I would not injure you or anything of yours; but the duration of my forbearance depends entirely upon yourself—that is, upon your silence."

Still the baronet spoke not.

Dick drew a pistol from his pocket, and deliberately cocked it.

The slight clicking sound caused the baronet to start.

His lips moved.

"Hold!" said Dick. "Say nothing until you have heard me speak. You see this pistol—I have taken especial care to prepare it so that there will be no danger of its failing me in the hour of need. If you attempt to do anything that will endanger my life or liberty, I will pull the trigger and put a bullet through your head without the least compunction."

Sir Humphrey shrunk back from the muzzle of the pistol, which was by far too close to his head to feel pleasant.

"Do not attempt to play me false," Dick continued. "I own you no ill will—I have never, to my knowledge, done anything to injure you; therefore why should you be so solicitous about giving me up to the officers of justice? I say to you again, beware! for if I saw you make the shadow of an attempt to betray me I would shoot you down, and think no more of it than I should of shooting a dog!"

Now, Dick could not have spoken a more unfortunate sentence than the last.

It re-awoke all the baronet's fury.

He thought about his dogs—his matchless, priceless bloodhounds, which had cost him so much trouble, and from whose doings he expected such great results.

They were dead, and before him stood the man who had deprived them of life.

"Dog, eh?" he begun; but Dick stopped him in a very forcible manner.

"That is too loud," he said—"much too loud for my safety. Speak lower or——"

He did not finish the sentence, but brought the muzzle of the pistol in contact with Sir Humphrey's cheek.

Wonderful to relate, at the first touch of the cold iron his face lost all its rubicundity, and assumed a strange, disagreeable tint which can be compared to nothing save dirty white wax.

"Now what have you to remark?" continued Dick, coolly. "Speak on; but don't raise your voice too high, and don't say anything disagreeable."

Sir Humphrey turned his goggling eyes full upon him as he said:

"You are the notorious Dick Turpin, I suppose?"

"What if I am?"

"Put down your pistol and sit there. I want to speak to you; but I can't while that infernal thing is digging into my cheek!"

"Agreed," said Dick. "I will sit here; but I shall not put down the pistol. I will keep it in readiness to use the moment I find occasion. My own safety demands that."

The baronet did not demur.

Dick sat down opposite to him on a chair, between the writing table and the window.

Before Sir Humphrey could speak, however, some one knocked at the door.

A change came over the baronet's face in a moment.

It was a slight one, it is true; but Dick noticed it for all that.

He understood it also.

The hope instantly sprang up in the baronet's breast that he should be able to make Dick his prisoner.

But he reckoned without his host.

"Mind what you say!" whispered the highwayman, once more bringing his much-dreaded pistol into view. "If you speak a word that I think will give rise to a suspicion that I am here, I will blow your brains out on the spot!"

This was a terrible threat, to which the appearance of the highwayman's pistol, held in an unwavering grasp, lent great extra force.

The knocking was repeated, and then some one turned the handle.

As Dick had locked the door, of course there was no fear of a sudden entrance.

"What have you got the door fastened for?" said a meek voice.

Dick recognised the speaker instantly.

It was the baronet's wife.

By the tone in which she spoke, as well as by the fact that she knocked at the door instead of entering boldly, Dick surmised that she stood in considerable dread of her liege lord.

Seeing Sir Humphrey was about to speak Dick whispered:

"Say, never mind."

"Never mind!" bawled the baronet, with a promptness of obedience that was really delightful.

"Never mind? What do you mean? Open the door and let me in!"

"I sha'n't!" said the baronet, doggedly.

Of course he spoke the words that Dick commanded.

"But you said you wanted me as soon as I could return."

"Never mind!"

"Yes—but I do mind! There's something amiss upstairs, I am certain; and I want to speak to you about it."

"Never mind!" answered Sir Humphrey, with a persistency which must have seemed strange indeed to his wife.

"But," said she, determined to carry her point, if such a thing could be at all possible, "young Lord Crake has just come. He is in the Red Room, and is waiting to see you."

"Never mind!"

"Never mind! Are you mad?"

"Go to the devil!"

The force and energy with which these last words were pronounced is indescribable.

The fact was, the poor baronet was suffering under a double irritation, and his temper, never at the best of times a very patient one, gladly made him seize upon this opportunity of giving vent to the angry feelings in his breast.

Silence ensued for a moment; but the good lady was not to be shaken off so easily.

"Listen to what I say——"

"Sha'n't!" interrupted the baronet, furiously, and without waiting for Dick to prompt him. "I say, I sha'n't, and I tell you to go to the devil!"

Hereupon his wife beat a retreat; but Dick allowed some moments to elapse before he ventured to speak.

"Sir Humphrey," were his first words, "you are a man of discretion. I see you fully realise that your life is of far more value than mine, and that you are too fond of enjoying the good things of this earth to wish to quit it in the hope of finding a better state of existence elsewhere."

The baronet only glared at him.

"Listen," said Turpin, "and I will let you know what I require of you. Do not start or seem so surprised—it is a mere trifle."

"What is it?" he managed to gasp out.

"I want to remain in the shelter of your house until night comes. It will not be long, for the day is already far spent. As soon as it is dark I will leave your house in peace, never again to return to it, never again to molest you or yours. Tell me now whether you think the favour is not a slight one, and such as you may grant?"

Sir Humphrey gave what was unquestionably a sigh of relief, but he said, grimly:

"You have the means of enforcing compliance."

"I have, I admit; but I shall much regret if I am driven to extremities. Knowing it to be inevitable, submit with a good grace. I again repeat that I require no more."

"Be it so," exclaimed Sir Humphrey, after a pause, though the way he spoke showed that his mortification was very great—"be it so. It's d—d disagreeable to have to submit in one's own house to the terms of a rascally highwayman; but I'd a d—d sight rather do that than lose my life!"

"Spoken like a man of sense. I am glad you have philosophy enough to look at the matter in so reasonable a light."

"Philosophy and reason be d—d, and you and all! You deserve hanging."

"That may be your opinion."

"It is my opinion; and further than that, I think hanging a d—d deal too good for you! You ought to be strung up by the neck, if only for one thing you have done."

"Indeed."

"I mean in fact," growled the baronet, with increasing ill-humour. "By all that I can hear, you had one of the best bits of horseflesh that man ever crossed——"

At these words, very much to the amazement of Sir Humphrey, Dick clasped his hands over his face and uttered a deep, remorseful groan.

"I say again, the best bit of horseflesh ever heard of. What a thousand pities that it should come into the possession of a d—d scoundrel like yourself, who knew no better how to use her than to ride until she dropped down dead beneath you. D—n it all! talk of hanging, you deserve to be drawn and quartered into the bargain!"

Sir Humphrey, as he spoke, brought his hand down upon the table with so much emphasis that it is a wonder it did not split beneath the blow, and finished off with a long string of oaths and imprecations which are best omitted.

But Dick was heedless of all.

The words uttered by the baronet struck deeply into his heart.

What he suffered in the shape of mental anguish and deep regret during those few moments that his face was hidden no one can know.

At last he looked up.

"You are right, sir," he said, in a broken voice, "I am a villain—a deep, double-dyed villain — one for whom no fate could be too bad—no death too ignominious."

"But did you do it?"

"Do what?"

"Ride her to death?"

"What, my bonny Black Bess?"

"Yes; I ask you whether it is true that you rode your famous mare to death?"

A sob almost choked Dick's utterance.

"I did," he said—"I did. Shame upon me that I did so!"

The baronet pushed back his chair.

"Then, Mr. Highwayman," he said, "let me tell you that I don't envy you your feelings. D—n me, the man who could do such a thing as that is—is—d—n me, I don't know what I could say that would——"

"You cannot say anything," replied Dick. "But I feel—I feel it here."

And as he spoke he struck himself sharply twice or thrice upon his breast.

CHAPTER MCXII.

DICK TURPIN DIGS A GRAVE FOR POOR BLACK BESS.

We have before mentioned the peculiar ideas Sir Humphrey Yeomans had about horses.

To him, they almost came first and foremost before everything; and had he only felt one half as much kindness and compassion for his fellow-creatures as he did for them he would have been a very humane man indeed.

But it was not so, the fault perhaps not being so much of his heart as of his education—if so it may be called—for he had been taught from infancy to show tyranny and cruelty to those who were stated to be his inferiors.

Indeed, the more he thought about the death of poor Black Bess the more heinous did Dick Turpin's crime appear.

In comparison to this, the committing of numberless highway robberies seemed of but slight consequence.

For this one fact, Dick Turpin was in his eyes a criminal of the very deepest dye; and after the acknowledgment he had made, he (Sir Humphrey) would not have hesitated to believe Dick guilty of any act, no matter how atrocious.

But the unfeigned remorse displayed by the highwayman touched the baronet a little, and in evidence of this he said:

"Come, my good fellow, you seem to be very much cut up, and about as sorry as I should be if I had done such a thing. Tell me all about it; perhaps when I have heard more particulars I may not blame you as much as I do now?"

Hearing these words, Dick raised his head a little.

"It would be churlish of me to refuse you this satisfaction after the kindness displayed towards me."

"Make no mistake," cried Sir Humphrey, quickly and sternly, "there is no kindness in the matter. I know my life is in your hands if you choose to take it; and I am so convinced that such is the case, that I am doing what I can to make the best of a bad job."

"As you will," answered Dick, sadly. "Still, it is strange to me if you do not feel a strong desire to learn something more about me than you at present know."

"I should like to know whether what I have heard is true," said the baronet, after a momentary hesitation.

"What is it?"

"Why, whether your mare actually carried you from London to York in twelve hours?"

Despite his sorrow and his loss, Dick's breast thrilled a little with pride as he said:

"She did—at least, so nearly accomplished the great feat that she did not give out until she was within the hearing of York bells. She did it," he added, with increasing triumph, "and the achievement will never be forgotten—never—never!"

"And so that reconciles you to it, does it?"

"It does—a little. Still, had I known the result——"

"Known the result," interrupted Sir Humphrey. "You must have known the result. Confound it, man, if you had brought your mare to me, I would have given you any money for her! You could not have set her at too high a price."

"No money would ever have parted us."

"And yet you killed her!"

"I did—I did—I did kill her, and ever since then my repentance has been most bitter."

There was another pause, and by the baronet's manner it seemed as though he was about to say something.

But if this was his intention, he was prevented from carrying it out, for there was another summons at the door.

Dick started at the sound.

"Sir Humphrey," he said, recovering his composure almost instantly, "I have no wish to cause a repetition of the disagreeable scene which took place on a former occasion. If you will promise me not to betray me—and after all, what good would it be to you were you to do so?—I will stand behind these curtains. No one will suspect my presence, and you could give admittance to whom you chose."

While Dick spoke these words in a rapid whisper, the knocking was repeated more than once, as though the person outside was most solicitous to obtain admission.

Then, before Sir Humphrey could reply, a voice said:

"Papa—papa, do let me come in; I want to speak to you so very—very badly—do let me come in!"

Dick knew this voice also.

It was Milly's.

The expression on the baronet's face suffered considerably as those words fell upon his ear.

"Give me your word," said Dick, "then go and unlock the door."

"Enough—I promise."

"But you must not leave the room."

Turpin as he spoke displayed his pistol somewhat ostentatiously.

Having done so, he hastened to conceal himself behind the massive folds of the damask curtain at one side of the window.

Evidently Sir Humphrey had come to the conclusion that the best policy he could adopt was to submit, for he went to the door and turned the key.

The very moment that he did so his daughter entered.

Her voice had been sufficient to indicate to Dick that she was labouring under great mental agitation, and he fancied he understood the cause of it when, peeping through the curtain, he saw that the first thing she did upon entering was to give a hurried glance around.

He was still more inclined to think so when he heard her sigh deeply like one who is suddenly relieved of some great distress.

But though this had something to do with her agitation, there was certainly something else, for she clung to her father's breast and burst into tears.

"Why, my dear," he said, so kindly, so gently that Dick was hardly able to believe his own ears, "what is the matter—what has happened?"

"Oh, papa," she said, endeavouring to repress her tears, "I feel so—so very much distressed."

"Well—well, come in. There, sit down beside me and let me know your trouble."

It really seemed that Sir Humphrey was so much concerned about his daughter's sorrow as to be oblivious of the fact that Dick was present, an observer and a listener to all that passed.

"Come," he said, with the same gentleness as before, "let me know your trouble? Do not be afraid to speak."

But Milly seemed to have a most unconquerable difficulty in commencing.

In fact, the more she tried the greater became her embarrassment.

"At least," said her father, "let me know the immediate cause of this unusual agitation. What is it?"

"Nothing."

"Nothing? Who is it, then?"

"Lord——"

She stopped, more confused than ever.

"Lord Orake?" said Sir Humphrey, interrogatively.

"Yes, papa."

"Well, what of him?"

"He is here again."

"I know it."

"And mamma would insist upon my going into the Red Room, where he is."

"Well, and if she did? I see nothing terrible in that."

"Oh yes, there was, papa. I told him that his suit was vain—that I could never love him; but he would not pay the least attention to my words. He laughed, and said that the match had been agreed upon long and long ago, and that you, papa, were quite determined I should wed no other."

Here she broke down entirely.

"Well, well," the baronet replied, a little testily, Dick thought, "I must say that my wishes and your mother's, too, both went in that direction. We considered that the union would be an advantageous one in all respects."

"And do you really wish it? Oh, papa, do not be so unkind as to seal my misery for life. Do not force me to marry a man I cannot endure!"

"Is he, then, so very, very distasteful to you?" asked Sir Humphrey, earnestly.

"More than I can tell you," she replied, with a slight shudder. "Oh, listen to my request: withdraw your consent—do not force this hated marriage upon me!"

A silence followed this appeal.

It was disturbed only by Milly's sobs.

From his post of observation Dick could perceive that a struggle of a somewhat powerful nature was going on in Sir Humphrey's breast.

With the keenest anxiety he waited to know what would be the result, for, need we say it, he felt the warmest interest in the fair girl who had saved him, and in everything which concerned her.

"Say no to him now, papa," she pleaded, seeming to gather hope and courage from his continued silence—"say no to him, and so secure my happiness. Oh, I can never—never love him!"

"It shall never be said, my dear," exclaimed the baronet, at length, "that I forced you to do anything so repugnant to your inclinations as this union seems to be."

"Oh, papa, how can I thank you for those words?"

"By casting off this sadness. I blame you much in the affair. You should have made me understand the state of your feelings earlier, and not have allowed matters to have gone so far as they have now."

"Do not—oh, do not upbraid me on that account! Believe me, papa, I have tried my best to conquer my aversion, because I thought, if I could only succeed, how pleased you would be. But, oh, papa, I found it impossible—quite impossible!"

She clung to him convulsively, and he, with all the tenderness he was able to display, endeavoured to soothe and calm her.

"There, my dear!" he said, kissing her tenderly. "Be calm now—forget this sorrow. I will go at once to the Red Room and make Lord Crake acquainted with the real facts of the case."

He rose and went towards the door.

Dick was in a dilemma.

He did not like to step forward and interfere, and yet at the same time he felt that he should not be right to allow the baronet to leave the room.

Sir Humphrey seemed to recollect all at once the engagement he had entered into, and he paused irresolutely, not knowing what to do.

"I will keep my word," he said, after a moment's thought, "and I leave behind me good security that I shall do so."

These words were in the highest degree enigmatical to Milly, who looked after her father with surprise very visibly depicted upon her features.

But the baronet hurried off.

Dick made no attempt to stop him, for he understood perfectly well what he meant.

After the door was closed Dick was half inclined to step forward and make Milly acquainted with his safety, for he fancied she must be enduring no little uneasiness on that very account.

But he hesitated and hesitated until the opportunity was lost; and perhaps it was as well that he did so.

The baronet returned after a very brief absence.

His countenance wore a very ruffled look.

"Now, my dear," he said, "be happy once again; for to see smiles upon your face does me more good than all else; besides, I have got through with that very disagreeable business. Lord Crake does not like it, and blusters, and talks a great deal about what he shall do. Let him try—I don't care that for him!"

He snapped his fingers contemptuously as he spoke.

But these vague threats seemed to alarm Milly greatly.

"Oh, papa, be careful—pray be careful!" she ejaculated. "Do not anger him too much—you do not know him as I do. If you did, you would not think of despising his threats, for I am sure that he would not stop short at any villany or wickedness."

"Pho, pho! Milly, you are nervous and excited. I think, too, that you misjudge Lord Crake. However, let things be how they may, the match is broken off at once and for ever."

The baronet spoke with great resolution, and Milly, again throwing her arms around his neck, wept and thanked him by turns.

Dick Turpin was far from being an unmoved witness of this scene.

It displayed the baronet to him in altogether a new light.

"What a world of pities it is," he thought, "that a man with such a noble, gentle heart should have his mind so warped and distorted by old prejudices! Never mind—he must, in spite of this, have the respect of all who know him thoroughly."

After some time he persuaded Milly to leave him, alleging for his excuse that he had matters of much moment to attend to.

The moment she passed out he closed the door and locked it.

As he did so, Dick emerged from his hiding-place.

But the pistol was in his pocket.

He was certain that there was no need of his weapon now.

By this time the shades of evening had begun to gather thickly.

Sir Humphrey and Dick had both been so closely occupied and so much interested in what had taken place, that they both failed to notice the obscurity that filled every corner of the apartment.

"Night will very soon be here," Dick said, as soon as he observed the circumstance; "and then I shall relieve you of my presence, which cannot fail to be most distasteful to you. Yet I shall leave with deep regret, and when I go I shall entertain a greater feeling of respect for you than for any man I have ever met with."

"Because I have connived at your concealment?"

"No; that is not the reason. It is because you have displayed a noble and manly heart."

A silence followed.

Dick made his way towards the window and looked out.

It was not yet so dark as to prevent him from seeing all over the garden.

His eyes were riveted at once upon a pickaxe and spade resting against one of the trees.

They had doubtless both been used very recently.

Whether they had been forgotten, or whether the man who had left them there would soon return and remove them to a place of security, were points upon which Dick would have been glad to be resolved.

He thought once of frankly telling the baronet what he wanted, but a little reflection soon induced him to alter his determination.

The question might have been asked for what purpose he required the tools.

He would in that case have been in considerable difficulty.

He had made up his mind that no living creature save himself should be made aware with the last resting-place of poor Black Bess.

The baronet above all persons should be kept in ignorance of it, because after what he had said he would doubtless feel a strong curiosity to see her.

This determined Dick.

He would run the risk of obtaining the tools.

Darkness came on rapidly, and Dick was thankful for it.

He was anxious for more reasons than one to get away from the vicinity of the Hall with as much speed as possible.

He felt that already he had lingered in one spot too long, and nothing was more probable than that the officers, being unable to hear any tidings of him abroad, would return to the baronet's domains in the hope of being able to get upon the scent again.

Time passed on, until, in fact, some one for the third time knocked at the library door.

"Sir Humphrey," said Dick, "it is now dark enough to leave, and I hasten to relieve you of my unwelcome presence. I go, feeling a deep debt of gratitude is owing. You may smile at the gratitude of such a man as I am. But who can say, perhaps a time may come when I shall have the chance of befriending you. If the chance does come, I shall avail myself of it to the utmost; and in any case, believe me when I say that you will find it much better to have Dick Turpin's friendship than his enmity.

The baronet made no reply, but smiled slightly.

"I will put you to the test, if you like," he cried.

"Do so—do so."

"Then you cannot requite what I have done for you better than by maintaining a profound silence respecting the events of this day. Do not mention the occurrence to a soul."

"You may rely upon being obeyed in that respect. Not a syllable shall ever pass my lips. But I shall not and will not look upon that as a requital. Farewell."

He bowed deeply as he uttered the last word.

Then, with a firm step, he walked towards the window, which, like most of them on the ground floor, opened like folding doors.

To turn the button and pass out took Dick but a moment.

He cast a hasty, wary glance around, but seeing no one, made a dart towards the tree, the position of which he had most carefully noted.

He could scarcely repress a cry of gratification upon finding that the tools were still where he had seen them.

Prudence whispered to him to be silent.

Shouldering the much-wished-for implements, he hastened off.

He made his way in the required direction without difficulty and without interruption, for there was no longer such a sharp look-out kept now the officers had departed.

He had to pause and look well about him more than once, in order to make sure that he was going right.

On approaching the Hall, however, he had been careful to note every object he passed, and so at almost every turn he found some familiar object.

Still, it was almost half an hour before he reached that little iron gate in the stone wall of which we have had occasion to make such frequent mention.

Before going to the spot where the remains of his poor mare lay, hastily covered with dead leaves, he looked up and down the high-road, so as to make sure that none of his foes were near.

Nothing could be seen—nothing could be heard; so he prepared to set about his task with very great confidence.

But when he reached the little mound of leaves his heart sank.

A sob rose up in his throat, and, struggling for utterance, almost choked him.

With a wild burst of grief, he threw himself at full length upon the mound, and gave way unrestrainedly to his emotion.

How long he remained there he had no clear idea, for his mind was too much troubled to pay any great regard to the flight of time.

Upon looking up, however, he saw that the moon was shining down upon him with a soft and beautiful radiance.

Sighing heavily, he rose to his feet.

"All the grief and all the remorse in the world is unavailing now," he said. "It will do me no good, nor will it bring back you to life, my poor—poor Bess! When I have performed my task the earth will cover every object of my affection. Nothing will be left—nothing—nothing!"

This melancholy reflection well-nigh overcame him; but, with a sudden effort, he summoned up all his energy, and set about the task he had made up his mind to perform.

He worked with a will; and to have seen him, no one would have guessed that he was so unaccustomed as he was to the use of spade and pickaxe.

The ground was soft, and this made a material difference; but then he had to make an excavation of great size.

But as the moon rose higher and higher in the sky, his work steadily proceeded.

Only occasionally did he pause to rest, and then only for the briefest possible space of time.

No sooner was his breath recovered than he recommenced.

He was anxious to get finished, for he knew not how soon some untoward interruption might take place.

"There is no need to go deeper, I think," he at last exclaimed, while wiping the perspiration from his dripping brow. "No one will suspect that you are here, and by means of all these leaves I shall easily hide all traces of the earth having been disturbed. Yes, I am certain it is deep enough."

So saying, he sprang out of the grave.

He then swept off the leaves with which he had covered poor Black Bess.

Once more, then, was her form fully revealed to him.

He stood gazing at her like one fascinated.

The bright moon, now high above the tree tops, enabled him to see with very great distinctness.

"Poor Bess—poor Bess!" he said, sadly. "This will be the last look that ever I shall take at these strong limbs, once so fleet, and now so rigid in death. I have killed you, and my only satisfaction is that your fame is established; and I would ten times rather see you lying thus stiffened and stark at my feet than know that you had fallen into other hands. This I can endure, but I could not bear the knowledge that you had found another master. Perhaps it is all for the best—at any rate, it will be consoling if I can only think so."

Dick was right enough there, and it was really wonderful to observe what a change was effected by this reflection.

In a steadier way, he now set about finishing his work, having the air of one who has made up his mind that it will be best to go through with a disagreeable business without flinching.

It taxed all his powers, however, to roll Black Bess into the grave.

Her weight seemed to have increased fully one-half, and he could only move her by what seemed imperceptible distances at a time.

But he persevered, and the body was brought nearer and nearer to the brink.

At last, by using the spade as a lever, he was enabled to roll her into the grave altogether.

As he had been careful to make the excavation large enough, he had no further trouble as regarded placing her in any other position than the one into which she chanced to fall.

A few moments of sad reflection passed, and then he threw in the first shovelful of earth.

It seemed to him as though some one had struck him a sharp blow upon his heart.

This was the first pang, and soon over.

Animating himself with all the resolution which he could command, he set briskly to work, and shovelled in the soil.

This was a work that proceeded with great rapidity, and ere long the large hole was completely filled up.

He stamped down the earth with his feet, so as to make it as firm and compact as possible; yet when he reached the surface much superfluous earth remained.

Convinced that it would not do to let it remain in a mass where it was, he, with infinite pains and trouble, carried it away, distributing it by shovelfuls over a large area.

This done, he returned to the scene of his labours, and covered the last resting-place of Black Bess with leaves in such a manner as would, he felt certain, conceal its locality.

CHAPTER MCXIII.

DICK TURPIN UNEXPECTEDLY FINDS HIMSELF INVOLVED IN A MOST STRANGE ADVENTURE.

His melancholy task thus brought to a completion, Dick Turpin flung away the implements with which he had achieved it, and, leaning against a tree, gave himself up to deep and bitter thought.

There was not one pleasant point upon which his mind could rest.

All was as dark, drear, and desolate as the scene around him, for some scudding clouds driven from the north-west had by this time obscured the disc of the queen of night.

As one might say, unconsciously Dick's eyes were fixed upon the leaves covering the grave of poor Black Bess, and yet the idea occurred to him of how much those dead, withered leaves resembled his own blighted hopes.

At length, with a sudden start, he aroused himself.

"Bess, my poor old lass, I have kept my word. I have done for you all that I am able. Now I must leave you And even at this moment the conviction comes over me that I have looked my last upon this scene. I shall never—never see it more."

He looked around him as well as the diminished light would allow him.

He fully intended that it should be a parting glance.

Having taken it, he stepped towards the wall.

He was about to look over to reconnoitre, when he was startled by a clear whistle.

The sound came from somewhere close at hand.

It was only natural that the fugitive should think it was in some way connected with himself—that he should come immediately to the conclusion that it boded danger to him.

Before he could make up his mind to do anything, however, the whistle was repeated a second and third time.

Being thus on his guard, and in expectation of hearing it, Dick was able to decide with tolerable precision as to the source from which the sound proceeded.

His first idea was that it came from the high-road, and was a signal made by some of his foes.

But now he was certain that it issued from the trees among which he stood.

This was altogether so strange and unlooked-for, that for a brief space of time he stood still in deep thought.

His brain worked busily—so busily that it would be impossible for us to give even a bare outline of what passed through his mind.

Perhaps if any notion was more distinct than another it was that he had been watched, and that this was a signal given by some one who had tracked him from the Hall—a signal that would let the officers form an idea of the whereabouts of their prey.

Such a supposition was a very likely one indeed, and one that made Dick feel no slight amount of anxiety, for he was conscious that he should now be found at a great disadvantage.

It seemed very much like a confirmation of this impression when he heard the sound of another whistle thrice repeated.

It was like the one he had first heard, except that it was fainter in tone.

But evidently it came from a considerable distance off.

It was succeeded by the trampling of horses' feet.

"I am right," said Dick, to himself, as he took his pistols from his pockets and got them in readiness for use—"they are coming now. All will be over in a few moments—I am found, and it will be in vain to fly.

"Is this retribution?" he murmured, after a brief pause. "Am I to die upon your grave, old girl? Was it so prophetic a feeling that told me I was taking my last look of this place? It seems so; but one thing, at least, is certain—I will die nowhere else. If a hundred officers attack me I will fling away my life, but I will never yield—never—never!"

Those who had known Dick Turpin could have told how terribly in earnest he was, by the way he compressed his lips and knitted his brows as soon as he had finished uttering his determination.

But he started again, and listened if possible with greater intentness than before.

His features changed their expression to one of puzzled doubt.

The sounds of the horses' hoofs had not ceased; on the contrary, they were much more audible, but mingled with their clatter could now be distinctly heard the rumbling of wheels.

"It is some vehicle which is coming," ejaculated Dick.

He drew a long breath, for he began to think it was very possible that he was not concerned in the matter at all.

But, beyond doubt, a few minutes at the most would settle that question.

Dick waited.

Nearer and nearer came the vehicle, until, with a sudden dash, it stopped somewhere very close indeed to the little iron gate in the garden wall.

Scarcely had the rumbling of wheels ceased than a footstep was heard.

By the peculiar crunching sound, Dick knew that it was some one treading with rather a heavy step upon the gravelled pathway.

Who was it?

Dick felt he would willingly give much to know, and also to learn why that carriage had been brought so strangely to the gate.

It was mysterious, to say the least of it, and therefore on that account alone quite enough to attract Dick's attention.

But, in addition to this, he seemed so much mixed up in events which had recently taken place upon Sir Humphrey's estate as to make him feel that everything connected with it was sufficient to awaken and claim all his interest.

This was why it was he stepped forward with great caution, in the hope of getting more intelligence than he at present possessed.

We have said that all around the ground was very thickly strewn with decaying fallen leaves, and such was the care Dick made use of in his advance that his footsteps were inaudible even to himself.

But he did not venture to go too near the gravel-path, lest he should be discovered.

Voices he could hear, but was not able to distinguish the words uttered, owing to the suppressed tones employed.

It was fortunate he paused, for the conversation ceased, and his quick ear caught a returning footstep

Dick crouched down behind the trunk of the tree that was nearest to where he stood.

Then peering through the gloom as best he could, he caught a glimpse of a tall figure muffled in a cloak.

But the obscurity was so great, and the figure passed by so quickly, that Dick was unable to form any definite opinion regarding his identity.

He disappeared, and his footsteps soon ceased to be heard.

"I must learn more of this affair," murmured Dick. "I feel that merely for my own safety's sake I ought to gather more intelligence. I will do it. But what shall be the first step?"

It did not require much deliberation to enable him to come to a decision upon this point.

With the same stealthfulness as he had formerly employed, Dick crept towards the wall.

On gaining it, he raised himself and peeped over the coping.

To his surprise, he saw, drawn up quite close to the little iron gate, a large travelling carriage.

It was drawn by four horses.

Upon one sat the postillion, and just inside the vehicle, partially revealed by the light of a lamp, Dick fancied he could detect some one seated and leaning back with folded arms.

He continued to gaze for several seconds.

Then, finding that there was really nothing of which he could take further cognisance, he retired, making use of the same silence and caution as before.

"There is something more in this than appears at first sight," he murmured. "I must try and find out what has become of the man in the cloak. It may be he will be the one that will throw a light upon all these dark proceedings."

With these half-uttered words upon his lips, Dick crept onwards in the direction taken by the stranger.

He did not actually tread upon the gravel-path, but he kept very close indeed to the edge of it.

Still, although he paused at frequent intervals, he found that all was profoundly still.

No sounds whatever floated to his keen, listening ears.

Further and further on he went—so far that he began to think that the stranger must have abandoned the gravel-path and struck off in some other direction.

Just as he paused in irresolution, he detected the faint murmuring of voices.

A little attention made him aware of the locality whence they proceeded, and he hastened in that direction.

As he went, he soon became sensible that the way was familiar to him.

He had trod that part of the domains before.

All at once he recollected that he was approaching the pond where he had had so narrow an escape from being wounded by the bullet from the officer's pistol.

But had to manifest if possible still greater caution in all his movements, owing to the silence which prevailed and the somewhat open nature of the spot.

[DICK TURPIN FALLS SENSELESS BEFORE THE GIPSY'S TENT.]

two figures at length met Turpin's view.

One was male, the other female, and that was about all he could distinguish clearly, save that they were talking very earnestly together.

So earnestly indeed, that he was emboldened to approach much nearer than he would otherwise have deemed prudent.

Nearer and yet nearer still he crept, in the continual hope that he should be able to overhear at least a few of the words they were exchanging.

He was successful.

The first words he detected were these:

"My lord, all your urgings are quite vain—it is useless for you to repeat them or to add others. I can never—never love you. You compel me to speak thus boldly. My father has put an end to the engagement between us—if such it could be called—and henceforth we must be strangers."

Dick knew that voice.

Every tone of it sent a thrill of gratitude and pleasure through his heart.

It was his protector—the baronet's daughter—who had spoken.

Great as had been the amount of interest experienced from the first by Dick, it was as nothing when taken in comparison with that which he now felt.

Why was she there?

What meant that carriage at the gate?

Who was her companion?

It was to the last of these three questions that Dick was able to return the most satisfactory reply.

It was Lord Crake who was standing by her side—the rejected suitor—and the individual who, no doubt, had blown the whistle which for a time excited so much uneasiness in Dick's breast.

But he had not much opportunity for speculation.

All his faculties were required to listen to what was said.

Lord Crake did not return any immediate reply; and Milly, in a voice which showed that her breast was full of agitation, continued:

"You assured me," she said, "that it was of the highest importance to me that I should meet you on this spot to-night—that not only my happiness depended upon it, but absolutely the welfare of all those that I hold dear. It was this last consideration which influenced me most—which induced me, after much hesitation, to make up my mind to accede to your request. I am here. Why do you not make the communication to which you have referred?"

"Have you weighed well all that you have said?" asked her companion, in a manner that seemed to alarm the young girl greatly.

"Yes," she answered, with an effort. "Why do you ask?"

"Simply that you should have nothing to reproach me with."

"How reproach you?"

"Listen, and I will tell you."

"Speak."

"You are perfectly certain that you do not and cannot love me?"

"Perfectly certain."

The answer was given with great dignity and firmness.

"And that no circumstances will occur that will induce you to love me sufficiently for you to consent to become my wife?"

"I do not believe it possible."

"Enough. We now understand each other."

"Sir!"

"You have spoken out clearly. Now it is my turn."

She shrank back in affright at his menacing manner.

But he stepped up closely to her, and, seizing her by the wrist, said, in rapid tones:

"Understand me clearly. You are in my power—wholly, utterly in my power, and, such being the case, I do not mind letting you know what you may expect. In the first place, then, I care no more for you than you do for me—and that is little enough, no doubt."

There was much bitterness in the way these words were pronounced.

But, without pausing, he continued, rapidly—so rapidly, and with so much apparent vindictiveness that Milly, terrified and, as it were, fascinated, neither moved nor spoke.

"But you are an heiress, while I am almost a bankrupt in purse. But it is your wealth I covet—and your wealth that I am determined to have! I tell you so without disguise. I would gladly have had it by fair means; but since you will not have it so, why, rather than fail, I will have it by foul! You are alone—no one can hear you even if you should cry out. Those at the Hall know nothing of your absence. I have things all my own way."

He ended almost with a scream of exultation.

But Dick drew just a trifle nearer, and as he did so he said to himself:

"Not quite so much as you imagine, my lord."

As for poor Milly, she was ready to sink to the ground with apprehension.

Terror overpowered all her faculties.

"Perhaps now," he continued, with a scornful and triumphant air—"perhaps now you wish you had behaved better to me, but it is too late. You are mine—wholly, irrevocably mine. My last chance of saving myself from utter ruin lies in making you my wife."

At these dreadful words Milly shrieked aloud.

So loud and piercing was the cry, and so shrilly did it seem to echo all around, that Dick fancied it could not fail to reach the ears of the inmates of the Hall.

Upon hearing this scream, Turpin's first impulse was to spring forward, but this reflection controlled him

"Another cry like that," said Lord Crake, with savage bitterness, "and you shall dearly rue having given it utterance. I tell you again that you are mine—that you cannot escape me. Listen—listen!"

Milly appeared almost ready to sink to the earth.

Indeed, it is probable that the tight grasp which was maintained upon her wrist kept her from falling.

Lord Crake went on.

He spoke with additional excitement

"Close at hand I have a carriage waiting—fleet horses are harnessed to it—faithful fellows of my own are in attendance. That vehicle shall carry us to a village some twenty miles off, and when we have passed a night there you will be glad to beg to be my wife instead of indignantly refusing as you do now."

"Help—mercy—help!" said Milly, faintly.

But, with a mocking laugh, her companion advanced a step, and flung his arms around her as though about to bear her away by main force from the spot.

Dick had kept quiet thus long with great difficulty.

He could not have done so but for his firmly-grounded expectation that ere long some one from the Hall would appear upon the scene.

But no one came, and so he resolved to interfere.

It was impossible to let matters go on further.

Other reasons, perhaps, induced Dick to hold back as he had done.

He knew well that he was near enough to step forward at any moment and save Milly from any personal harm, and he wished to know to what extent Lord Crake would commit himself.

Precipitation on Dick's part would have ruined all.

Besides, the disappointment of his lordship would be all the greater, and consequently his punishment all the more severe, if he was foiled in what he believed to be the crowning moment of his success.

But when Dick saw him fling his arms around her in the manner we have described, his intentions being, doubtless, to bear her to the carriage that was in waiting, he could contain himself no longer.

With a sudden bound, he quitted his place of concealment and stood before Lord Crake.

Dick held a pistol in his hand, and the use that he immediately made of it was to present it to his lordship's breast, while he said, in a suppressed voice:

"Villain! release your hold upon this lady! And if you refuse, or raise such an outcry as shall bring your fellows to your aid, this moment shall be your last!"

It may safely be asserted that his lordship could not have been more astonished if Dick had suddenly dropped from the clouds.

It was probably while under the influence of this amazement that he released his hold upon his captive.

In her agitation, she did not at first recognise Turpin.

Finding in a moment to whom it was she owed her deliverance, she clung to him for protection.

"Save me—save me!" she half shrieked. "Save me from this man! You spoke about your gratitude—you have now an opportunity of showing it! Save me—save me!"

"Be under no apprehensions," said Dick; "you are quite safe. I have been watching you, and should have interfered before had I thoroughly understood the matter."

Dick still kept the barrel of his pistol steadily pointed at Lord Crake, who made not the least attempt either at resistance or escape.

But that he should prove one of the rankest cowards in the world will surprise no one, for none but a coward could have planned the base design which Turpin had so fortunately been able to frustrate.

But advancing footsteps could now be heard, and immediately afterwards lights appeared here and there among the trees.

Voices, too, were heard calling out, and Dick, believing these new-comers to belong to the Hall, responded to their cries in order to guide them to the scene of action.

Upon observing this, Lord Crake made an attempt to fly

Turpin, however, prevented him in a moment by seizing him by the arm and pressing the muzzle of the pistol against his cheek.

Footsteps were now heard coming from the direction of the iron gate.

It was at this moment, too, that the first party appeared.

With a glad cry of relief, Milly left Dick's side and flung herself upon the breast of some one that Dick instantly recognised to be the baronet.

Sir Humphrey looked about him in great surprise, evidently unable to comprehend the meaning of what he saw.

Before he could collect himself sufficiently to ask a question, Lord Crake's two accomplices came into view.

No sooner did they find themselves confronted by so large a party than they turned and fled.

"Seize those men!" cried Turpin, in a loud voice. "Do not allow them to escape on any account!".

There was so much command in the way he spoke that, without hesitation, several set off in pursuit, not pausing to ask themselves who had issued the order and whether they ought to obey it.

The sound of Dick's voice had the effect of drawing the baronet's attention to him.

"Hullo!" he exclaimed, "is it you? What is the meaning of all this?"

"Ask your daughter, and ask this man," responded Dick.

Sir Humphrey at once appealed to Milly.

The task of giving a relation of what had taken place was almost beyond her powers.

But she said enough to enable her father to comprehend the rights of the case.

His rage was so great that he was about to inflict a summary chastisement upon his lordship there and then.

But a fresh event occurred, which produced an entire revolution.

This was nothing less than the return of Mr. Skellum and his party.

They had been many miles round the country, and although they had everywhere made the closest inquiries, they had failed to learn any particulars of the man they sought.

That he could have got away entirely unseen they did not believe to be possible, and it was this belief which induced them, as a kind of last hope, to return to the vicinity of the Hall.

Mr. Skellum in especial clung to the idea that Dick was concealed somewhere on the premises.

Very luckily, Dick was apprised of their approach before they came into view.

One of those who had started off in pursuit of Lord Crake's two accomplices came back and said:

"Your worship—your worship, the Lunnon officers have come back! They will be here in a minute! That's what I call lucky!"

"Hold this fellow, some one!" cried Dick, referring to his lordship.

Half a dozen eagerly rushed forward and seized him.

Dick was about to dash off at once, in the vague and desperate hope that he should be able to secure his safety by immediate flight, when Milly flung herself before him and arrested his further progress.

"Father—father, this man—I know not who he is, save that he is in terror of the law, and that the officers are doing all they can to take him prisoner—I say it is to him, and to him alone, that I owe my safety this night. But for his interposition Lord Crake would have carried out his odious designs. Surely such a great service as this should not go unrequited? No, no—a thousand times no! You must interpose your authority—you must prevent his capture."

Sir Humphrey, as a rule, was not a very good thinker.

More particularly was he puzzled when several things were said to him in a breath, and when it was necessary for him to decide suddenly upon some method of proceeding.

But his faculties had been much quickened by the discovery of the imminent danger in which his daughter had been placed.

He was able to understand the peril in which Dick stood.

But he knew not how to save him.

The officers were not more than a few yards distant, and in a moment or two would appear upon the scene.

Publicly to attempt to throw the shield of protection before him he knew to be far beyond his powers.

What, then, was he to do?

He was willing to save Dick, for he prized his daughter highly.

But the matter required careful and continued thought.

This was now out of the question.

It was imperative that he should make up his mind at once.

CHAPTER MCXIV.

DICK TURPIN CONCEALS HIMSELF IN THE OLD SUMMER-HOUSE.

When Milly first spoke, Dick had remained still, his breast being filled with the vague hope that Sir Humphrey might in some way interpose and save him.

Unless something of the kind was done, too, he felt that his chances of escaping his persistent foes were slight indeed.

But when he saw the indecision which manifested itself in the baronet's manner, he resolved not to linger and not to depend upon anyone but himself in procuring his safety.

"Many thanks," he said, gently striving to release himself from Milly's grasp. "The intention to help me is as well appreciated and as much valued as the very act of doing so would be. But you must leave me to shift for myself."

"Nay, I'll be d—d if I do!" said the baronet, with great warmth.

"But I must go!" pleaded Dick. "It will be death to me if I remain here another moment!"

"Where will you go?"

"Leave that to me."

"No, I tell you!"

"Too late—too late!"

"No—no! Skirt the fishpond here—make your way as fast as you can along the path, and it will bring you in sight of an old, dilapidated summer-house. Enter that, and you are safe."

"How so?" asked Dick, eagerly.

He had released himself from Milly's detaining grasp, and was about to dart off, when the last words of the baronet arrested him and revived his hopes.

"There is a fireplace there," continued the baronet, speaking with great haste and excitement, though he so suppressed his voice that none but his daughter and the fugitive could hear him—"press down on the right-hand corner of the mantel-shelf, and pull towards you—a recess will be disclosed——"

The baronet would doubtless have entered into further particulars, but Dick had heard enough to answer his purpose.

"Thanks—a thousand thanks!" he cried, and then rushed off at the top of his speed in the direction mentioned by the baronet.

But he had already lingered too long.

The police officers all caught sight of the flying form.

Mr. Skellum held a drawn pistol in his hand.

"Stop—stop," he yelled—"stop, or I fire!"

But Dick only increased his pace.

Skellum was as good as his word.

He pulled the trigger.

"I believe I have winged him," he said, as coolly as though he had been speaking of a partridge.

It was at this moment that he caught sight of Sir Humphrey.

"I have him now, your worship—I feel sure I have him now! Something seemed to tell me that he was still lurking about your premises"

Sir Humphrey did not speak, for the very simple reason that he knew not what to say.

He seemed, too, to have a very great amount of confidence in the hiding-place he had signified to Turpin.

His only fear was as to the extent of the hurt he had received.

On the present occasion Skellum was too much excited by the success he had met with to show the baronet much of that deference which he had hitherto been so careful to display.

No sooner had he finished speaking the words we have just recorded than he slipped from his horse, and, calling to his men to follow him, dashed off in pursuit.

Poor Milly was a prey to a thousand terrors.

It was an instinct with her to side with the unfortunate: and the mere fact of Dick having so many enemies to contend with would doubtless have called forth all her compassion; but now that he had rendered her such an important service, she was doubly anxious that he should be saved.

Indeed, when Skellum departed so suddenly, she was just calming herself with the intention of making an appeal to him to let the highwayman go free.

As this appeal would have been utterly fruitless, it was quite as well that it should have been left unmade.

"Oh, father—father," she exclaimed, bursting into tears, and clinging convulsively to Sir Humphrey's breast, "we shall see him slain before our eyes!"

"No—no, my dear! I believe—that is, I hope that he is quite safe. If he can only reach the summer-house in time to conceal himself in the recess——"

"But I am afraid he has not had time. Do you think he has?"

"It is hard to say. He would make great speed unless very severely wounded, which I hope he is not."

Milly wept afresh.

"Have you no power to save him?" she asked. "If you have, exert it for my sake."

"Openly, I have not; but if he has gained the recess all will be well."

"Will not the officers discover it?"

"There is little fear. The secret was, I believe, known only to me up to to-night. It was a contrivance made in troublous times, in order to afford a hiding-place and a means of escape."

No more was said then upon the subject, for Lord Crake interrupted them.

He had been greatly disconcerted by the unexpected turn which affairs had taken, and not a little astonished by the arrival of the police officers, and the events which had succeeded.

But that base, unblushing effrontery of which he possessed no inconsiderable share at last came to his aid.

Immediately he set about attempting to free himself from his present position.

"Sir Humphrey," he cried, in a loud voice, "I know not what your purpose or intention may be in keeping me a prisoner thus; but I can assure you the wisest thing you can do is to set me at liberty."

This cool request would most likely have brought some terrible expletives to the lips of Sir Humphrey had not Milly interposed.

"Yes—yes," she said—"set him free. Let us never see him more. We know him now, and in the future shall be able to beware of him."

"If I do, may I——"

"Hold!" interrupted the dissolute young noble. "Just ask yourself what good you are likely to derive by pushing this matter to extremities? I tried a bold plan—I have failed. Let that be the end of the matter; and the quieter it is kept and the less your daughter is mixed up and mentioned with it, the better it will be for her reputation."

What effect this hint may have had upon the mind of the hot-tempered baronet we know not.

But he said to those who held Lord Crake in custody:

"Release him—let him go where he likes. If I want him I shall be able to find him, and until then he will only be an incumbrance."

The men quitted their hold upon him with great reluctance.

They were every one deeply devoted to their young mistress, and felt keenly the gross insult that had been offered her.

Their fingers itched to take some personal cognisance of the matter.

Most wishful and significant were the glances cast towards the fishpond.

The presence of their master, however, restrained them.

They were well acquainted with his fiery disposition, and had all learned the wisdom of shewing implicit obedience to his commands.

"Papa—papa," said Milly, "let us leave this place. Let us follow the police officers to the old summer-house. Who knows what may have happened? Who can say that our presence will be altogether useless?"

Having nothing to keep him on the present spot, the baronet readily yielded to his daughter's wish.

Moreover, he was very anxious to have his own natural curiosity gratified.

Their departure was eagerly watched by the men who had so lately had charge of Lord Crake.

In another moment, without a word being exchanged—for all were animated by the same desire—they turned and pounced upon their late prisoner, who had not yet had time to get out of their reach.

In vain he struggled and fought, and called in a loud voice upon Sir Humphrey.

The baronet either could not or would not hear.

"Into the old fishpond with him!" was the general cry. "We will make him ford his way across it. Come on—come on! We'll cool his love for him, I'll warrant!"

Lord Crake stood in great dread of his prospective punishment.

He was one of those effeminate creatures to whom the idea of cold water is too horrible to endure a moment's contemplation.

And then the water in the pond too, so thickly overgrown with green slimy weeds as it was, and so bitterly cold as it would most likely prove, for it was the winter season.

But his captors did not think once of turning aside from any such consideration as this.

In vain he offered them large sums of money if they would only set him at liberty—if they would only relinquish their intention of giving him a cold bath.

Then he tried threats, warning them what would be the consequence if they perpetrated this assault upon him.

To his mortification he discovered that no more notice was taken of his threats than of his bribes.

"Now then, my lads," cried one; "let us go all together. Get ready!"

"Right you are!"

"One—two—three!"

At the last word they suddenly ceased swinging him to and fro between them, and the consequence was he was hurled forward through the air several feet.

He came down with a terrific splash into the water; and as he happened to reach it upon his back, he floundered about most tremendously for a moment or two, to the infinite amusement and satisfaction of his tormentors.

At last, blinded and breathless, he gained his feet, and made a frantic dash towards dry land.

But they drove him off.

They were determined not to let him get out unless he chose to wade across and emerge upon the other side.

But, stung to rage and fury, he foolishly refused to do this.

But the men were firm, and all his attempts to land proved fruitless.

They pelted him with stones; they picked up handfuls of the half-dry mud at the brink of the pond and flung at him, until his condition was deplorable indeed.

In the end he had to succumb.

But the yell of delight and derision with which he was greeted when he turned his back to them and began to wade across, so infuriated him that he paused, and seemed half inclined to commence the unequal contest again.

But he thought better of it.

Summoning up all his energies, he made his way across the pond with all the speed that was possible.

But as the sheet of water was of considerable extent, the feat was neither easily nor speedily accomplished.

When he did reach the other side, a more forlorn-looking object than this dissolute young nobleman presented could not by any means be imagined.

Dripping with wet, plastered from head to foot by the slimy mud at the bottom of the pond, and the still more slimy green weed which floated on the surface, and with his features scarcely distinguishable, he did indeed look the very embodiment of wretchedness.

A shriek of laughter from the men on the opposite bank reached his ears.

Maddened with fury, he turned round and shook his clenched fists, while curses and threats of vengeance poured from his lips.

But, from a movement that was made by the throng, he surmised that they were about to run round with the view of repeating their discipline.

This was greatly to be dreaded, so turning round he tore along at the utmost speed he was capable of making.

He pressed his hands to his ears, so as to shut out the derisive cries by which he was pursued, and felt truly thankful when a little clump of trees hid him from their hated view.

Leaving him to his fate, however, we return to [illegible], who requires all our attention.

Mr. Skellum was quite right when he said he had "winged him."

Dick was conscious of two things, which seemed to him simultaneous.

These were a sharp blow on his arm, such as might be given by a stick, and the report of a pistol.

He knew he was wounded in the arm even before he observed that it was hanging by his side numbed and painless.

But the effects, of course, would quickly make themselves felt.

Still he did not pause; but, grinding his teeth, bounded forward with additional speed.

He heard his pursuers hastening after him, and he would have at once given himself up for lost but for the hope of safety which the old summer-house held out to him.

That stimulated him to make what we are justified in calling supernatural exertions.

It was not until he had run for some distance, and felt the warm blood trickling down his fingers, that he remembered that he was leaving a crimson trail behind him, which the officers would have no trouble whatever in following.

Unless this was stopped, even the secret recess in the old summer-house would prove valueless to him.

He was obliged to pause, though by pausing he knew how very greatly he was diminishing his chances of safety.

Still it was unavoidable.

With great rapidity he tore off his neckcloth, and with equal speed bound it roughly round his arm, so that even if the flow of blood was not stanched, yet it was prevented from trickling to the ground.

The delay was so trifling as to be, under ordinary circumstances, almost unappreciable.

Yet, in the present instance, it allowed his foes to gain upon him fearfully.

Nerving himself to make, if possible, increased exertion, Dick followed in the direction indicated by the baronet, straining his eyes in the continual hope of being able to catch sight of the dilapidated building.

At last he saw something that was a few shades darker than other objects around him, and towards this he ran, convinced it was what he wanted.

Breathless, and throbbing with pain, he dashed open the partially-closed door, and glared around him.

That is, he endeavoured to do so, for the interior of the summer-house was profoundly dark.

Still he fancied he saw the fireplace, and strode across the flooring.

He was right.

Remembering the directions he had received, he pressed upon one end of the mantel-shelf, and then pulled towards him.

Having only one hand to use, he found this task a difficult one

But the exigency of his situation seemed to endow him with fresh strength.

The whole mass came towards him.

Whether there really was a recess or not, he could not perceive; but, pushing in, he found the baronet had described the hiding-place correctly.

But by the time this much was done the officers had got to within a dozen yards of him.

He had still to pull the fireplace back into its place again, and about this he had not waited to receive any instructions whatever.

But Dick's fingers were busy.

With great haste he felt up and down, and in an instant encountered a kind of handle, shaped something like a loop.

This he seized with his right hand, and then pulled towards him with all his might.

The front of the fireplace was made to open on hinges after the fashion of a door, and he pulled until it was impossible to pull any further.

Yet, even then he did not release his hold, but stood grasping the handle, and waiting with no trifling amount of anxiety the approach of his foes.

In this respect he would not have grumbled if his patience had been taxed a little more severely, for scarcely had he drawn the grate into into its place than several of his foes reached the threshold.

"Hullo!" said a voice, which he recognised at once as being Mr. Skellum's—"hullo! what place have we here? Is he inside, I wonder?"

"I believe I saw him enter," said another voice, "though the darkness prevents me from saying for certain."

"Well, we shall soon know," continued Skellum. "Out with a light, some of you! Be quick, can't you!"

The words were scarcely out of his mouth before Dick caught sight of a glimmer of light.

This naturally raised in his breast a thousand apprehensions.

He made sure that as he could see this light he could not properly have closed the recess.

If so, nothing could prevent his discovery.

With an anxiousness of which it is possible for some remote idea to be formed he waited to hear what should happen next.

The lantern seemed to be flashed all round the place, and then some one said:

"There's no one here."

"So it seems," responded Skellum, though by the tone in which he spoke it might be inferred that he was not over well assured of the fact.

"I fancied myself I saw him come in here," he continued; "and it is certain he made in a direct line for the place; but I must have been deceived, for there is not room here to hide a cat."

Indeed, the summer-house, owing to its disuetude, was absolutely destitute of every article of furniture.

A silence ensued.

Dick's heart beat at such a fearful rate, and to him apparently with so much loudness, that he dreaded it would betray him.

The officers retired towards the door.

Dick breathed a little.

They crossed the threshold.

He breathed with tolerable ease.

The officers went a little way and listened.

But not the faintest sound reached their ears.

They regarded each other with puzzled looks.

This disappearance, so sudden and so complete as it appeared to be, was most mysterious.

What had become of him?

He could scarcely have continued his flight, because, had he done so, the unavoidable noise made by his rapid progress would have been audible at a great distance.

"He is hiding somewhere again, sir," cried one of the officers. "Why, he is ten times worse to hunt than a fox."

"Never mind," said Skellum. "We will take our time. He can't get far, that's one comfort. I'll find out where he is hidden, depend upon it."

That he was hidden somewhere was the general impression.

It was at this juncture that Sir Humphrey and his daughter made their appearance.

They were both somewhat breathless, in consequence of the speed they had made.

"Have you got him?" gasped the baronet.

Mr. Skellum was obliged to make the mortifying confession that he had not.

And now, had he not considered that the fact of the pair before him being in collusion with the fugitive was wholly impossible, he must have had his suspicions aroused by the satisfaction which Milly manifested on receipt of the admission.

It was not that she spoke or started, but she gave her father a glance that was in the highest degree expressive.

"Why, bless me," puffed the baronet, wiping his face with his silk handkerchief—"the fellow doubles and turns like a fox. I thought you had shot him."

"So I did, sir, there's no mistake about that," said Mr. Skellum, as though he derived uncommon satisfaction from his knowledge of the fact.

"Then how the devil has he contrived to slip through your fingers this time," asked the baronet, "and you so close at his heels, too?"

"That's what I can't make out just at present," replied Skellum. "But I don't despair. He is not far away, I am assured."

"Why do you think that?"

"Because of the suddenness of his disappearance. He has got into a hiding-place somewhere close by—no doubt the same in which he had been concealed while I searched for him before."

The concern which Milly now felt and unconsciously displayed in her countenance was even still more provocative of suspicion than her former satisfaction.

Luckily, however, Mr. Skellum did not observe it; and this is not so much to be wondered at when it is borne in mind that there was no other light than issued from the dark lantern of one of the men.

"So you do not despair?" said the baronet.

"Not by any manner of means. He is hidden somewhere within a few yards of this place; perhaps he may even be able to hear the words that I now speak. But let the place of concealment be as good and as cleverly-contrived as may be, yet I will undertake to discover it."

The positive air with which Mr. Skellum spoke caused Milly to suffer much real terror.

In her own heart from this moment she gave Dick up for lost.

The baronet did the same, yet both waited with feverish anxiety to learn the result of the officers' movements.

"I wish you luck in your search," said Sir Humphrey; "though, if I spoke my opinion, I should say he is far enough off by this time, and that while you are standing here he is rapidly increasing that distance."

But Skellum shook his head with a very positive air.

"I could almost have sworn that I saw him run into this summer-house."

"Into the summer-house?" echoed Sir Humphrey and his daughter, speaking both together.

"Yes."

"Have you looked?"

"Oh yes. We have just had a peep."

"And he is not there?"

"It seems not," responded Skellum; "but I am by no means certain of it. At any rate, I shall not be satisfied until I have had another good look."

Most fortunate indeed was it that he turned upon his heel at this moment.

Had he not done so he could not have failed to see the great distress into which Milly was plunged by these last words, which seemed to her to be the death-knell of Turpin's hopes.

CHAPTER MCXV.

MR. SKELLUM MISSES HIS PREY BY A HAIR'S BREADTH.

SIR HUMPHREY had too good an opinion of the hiding-place to feel afraid that it would be found out very easily, and so he pressed his daughter's arm in a way that he intended should reassure her and followed the police officers into the summer-house.

The first thing they heard after crossing the threshold was a loud exclamation from Mr. Skellum, which seemed to betoken the discovery of something important.

"The light here," he cried—"the light, I say."

The lantern of course was immediately handed to him, and the first use he made of it was to direct the beam of light on to the ground.

"Ah," he cried, "it seems I am right after all."

"What is it—what is it?" asked the baronet, pushing forward.

"Nothing more than a spot of blood, your worship," was the reply. "Look here, it is round and red, and it has not been here long either."

By way of proving that this assertion was correct, he smeared it with his foot, which left no doubt of its liquidity.

"He has been here," he cried. "I thought it odd if I should be mistaken. He is concealed somewhere in or about this building, and with your permission, Sir Humphrey, we will set about finding him."

"Oh, certainly—certainly," answered the baronet, who was aware it would be most unwise to attempt to oppose the police officers in such a matter.

By the steps he now took, Mr. Skellum plainly showed that such business as the present was by no means strange to him.

Some of the men he directed to watch closely the exterior of the structure, while to one he gave particular instructions.

For his own part, he pulled out his discharged pistol, and grasping it by the barrel, used the butt as a hammer.

He struck a couple of sharp blows with it upon the wooden wall of the summer-house, beginning close to the door.

The knocks were responded to by the man outside, whom he had told to test the outer side while he tested the inner.

"Go on," he cried—"all right."

The man walked on responding to every blow given by his chief.

The sound was quite sufficient to enable the most inexperienced person to pronounce with certainty as to whether there was any cavity, recess or secret hiding-place in the walls.

The examination went on rapidly, and as the old summer-house was not of very great extent, it follows that they very soon got near the fireplace.

The baronet had by no means reckoned upon such a rigid scrutiny as this, and could hardly hope that the hiding-place would hold out against it.

It was in all ways most unfortunate that the drop of blood should have been seen on the floor, because it was that which changed Skellum's suspicions into certainties.

The fireplace was now reached.

He had not particularly noticed this before, and his first act was to peep up the chimney.

"Is there anyone there?" asked one of his men.

"I think not, for I can see the night sky through the top. However, I'll soon settle the point.

"Dick Turpin," he cried, "I give you warning that I am about to fire a loaded pistol up this chimney. If you are concealed, speak—if not, the consequence will be upon your head, not mine."

With these words he very deliberately drew a pistol and cocked it.

No notice was taken of his summons, and a sufficiently long interval of silence succeeding, he put his arm up the chimney and pulled the trigger.

The report in that confined space was tremendous.

But nothing was brought down save a quantity of soot, which age had made almost as hard as mortar.

The crazy old building shook from the shock, and seemed for a moment as though it would fall to the ground.

The apprehension of this danger was soon over, and then Skellum said:

"He is not there."

This disappointment, if such we may term it, did not cause him to relax his former exertions.

In his own mind he was quite satisfied that Dick was hidden very close at hand, and nothing but care and patience were required to unearth him.

The fireplace came in for a due share of his scrutiny.

His first act was to tap at the back of it.

A most unmistakably hollow sound was returned.

"Hallo!" he said, and with the word he knocked again.

If possible, the sound was more indicative of the existence of a cavity than it was before.

"Potter!" bawled Skellum.

"Yes, sir," responded the man outside.

"Why the devil don't you answer my knock?"

"I have, sir."

"Knock again."

He listened, and the sound of a blow was heard, but most evidently it was not delivered against the back of the fire-place.

"Your worship," he said, "I have found out the secret at last; I was sure I should do so before very long. But you must give me your permission to look further into this business. Of course I will undertake to do no more damage than I can help."

Milly now was all but in a swoon.

She would have given worlds to get away, yet she could not command herself enough to speak or to make one single movement.

She expected now nothing less than to see Dick Turpin slain before her eyes.

Her father was almost as discomposed as she was; and it was, perhaps, more because he fancied he ought to speak than any other cause, that made him say:

"What was it you thought of doing, Mr. Skellum?"

"I shall be compelled, your worship, in the faithful discharge of my duty, to break into the hiding-place which I am sure exists here."

"Oh, very well—of course," muttered Sir Humphrey, not knowing what other words to make use of.

Being convinced that there was some means of gaining a ready access to this place of concealment caused Mr. Skellum to look narrowly for some kind of secret fastening.

While thus engaged, that chink through which Dick had seen the light of the lantern was presently discovered.

"Here we have it! Now, my lads, keep a sharp look-out round the outside, and if he attempts to run away shoot him down! We will stand no more nonsense!"

So saying, Mr. Skellum drew the heavy cutlass he carried by his side and inserted the point in the crevice we have mentioned.

Then using the weapon as a lever, he succeeded in forcing open the hidden doorway, which, as it was not secured by any spring or snap, caused but very little trouble.

A small recess like a closet was then disclosed, about large enough for a man to stand upright in.

But the recess was empty.

Milly had closed her eyes, determined not to be a witness of the slaughter of the man she had befriended; and when she opened them again she could scarcely believe that she saw aright.

By what unaccountable magic had the highwayman contrived to disappear?

Mr. Skellum was disconcerted for the moment, but we must do him the justice to state that it was for the moment only.

"The light," he cried—"show me the light, and don't relax your vigilance in the least!"

But before we describe the further proceedings of the officers we will return to Dick and give some account of his actions.

No sooner, then, was he conscious that his foes had quitted the old summer-house on the first occasion than he turned round and felt the walls of the recess, wondering whether there was any other means of leaving it than that by which he had entered.

He devoutly hoped such would prove to be the case, and he had tolerable good grounds for the indulgence of this hope, for he remembered what the baronet was saying when he interrupted him.

But his hands enabled him to make no discovery.

When he turned his back to the fireplace he all at once became aware that fresh air was blowing lightly upon his face.

This pointed in the same direction as his hopes, and seemed to go to show that there was an outlet at no great distance.

With a view of reaching the back of the recess, he put his foot forward, and it was well for him that he exercised some caution in putting it down.

It was the fear lest his foes should hear him that made him unusually careful, and he congratulated himself upon his prudence, for he could find no resting-place to put his foot upon.

He was, in fact, standing at the top of a rudely-made staircase which descended very precipitously.

When Dick made this discovery his heart leaped with joy.

Without more ado he commenced making a descent, using the utmost caution in all his progress and keeping his one hand well extended before him to guard against coming into sudden contact with any object.

It was no slight thing thus to make his way through the total darkness in a place that he was utterly unacquainted with.

For aught he knew, some terrible peril might lie in his path, and he be unconscious of it until too late.

It was but rarely Dick was without the means of procuring a light.

Unfortunately, this was one of those rare occasions, and in consequence he wasted much valuable time, for in progressing as he did twice as much time was taken as would have been consumed had he only been able to see before him.

He was much encouraged by the fact that as he advanced the rush of cold air was more and more sensible, which convinced him he was making his way towards the outlet.

Suddenly, however, to his inexpressible astonishment, this ceased.

He stopped, wondering what could be the cause of so strange a circumstance.

There was no doubt about it—the air ceased to blow upon his face.

A great dread now came over him—one that for a moment deprived him of all motion.

This was, that by some means or other his foes had learned the whereabouts of the outlet, and had closed it.

At this reflection he leant against the wall for support.

He felt giddy and sick, and no wonder, for he had lost a great quantity of blood.

The ensanguined fluid was indeed even now escaping in much greater quantity than he was aware of.

Some moments elapsed before he could make up his mind what to do, when luckily a fresh idea occurred to him.

In obedience to it, he turned and retraced his steps.

Presently, as he had almost been afraid to expect, he felt the fresh air again blowing upon him.

This convinced him that he must on the former occasion have passed some branching-off passage which communicated with the open air, and kept along the one that doubtless led to a secret doorway in some apartment in the Hall.

Like most other people at that time, Dick knew very well that there was scarcely a dwelling of any importance and antiquity throughout the land that was unprovided with at least one secret means of exit, and that this was a secret means of communication with the Hall he was perfectly certain.

Using more care than on the former occasion, when indeed his principal aim had been to keep on in a straight direction, he proceeded until he came to a corner where another passage appeared to branch off at right angles.

As it was so profoundly dark, and as he was in too much haste to observe these things closely, he had no very clear notion of the place.

The air blew on his face, and he was content.

Heedless of the danger there might be in doing so, he ran on with extended arms, hoping to make up for the precious moments that had been lost.

In point of fact, the time to him seemed very much greater than it was in reality.

A few moments more, and to his great joy he perceived a faint glimmer of twilight in advance—so faint that no one could have descried it unless after being in total darkness as long as Dick had.

He quickened his steps, and soon after emerged on the side of a little hill which formed one side of a dingle or large dell, which was thickly covered with thorn-bearing bushes.

So well did these conceal the entrance to the secret passage that, after Dick emerged and turned round, he was unable to perceive it.

Just then, such a fearful sensation of sickness came over him that he had much difficulty in saving himself from falling.

A kind of stupor, or state of semi-consciousness, followed.

But the knowledge of his imminent peril never left him, and it was this knowledge which enabled him, after a brief interval, to shake off in some degree the oppressiveness which weighed him down.

He knew, too, what was the cause of this deathlike sensation and his first act was to take the neckcloth and fold it up something in the form of a surgical bandage.

When this was done, it was no easy task to bind up his left arm in such a way as to check the effusion of blood, nor did he succeed, though he managed to stop the flow to a very great extent.

He listened.

From the silence which reigned around, he ventured to hope that his foes had once more lost his trail, and it was this hope which animated him to make all the exertion he could to get away from the spot.

Leaving him for a brief space to struggle on through the baronet's domains, we will return to the summerhouse, because some events took place there that were of a very startling character indeed.

It will be recollected that Mr. Skellum had called aloud for a light.

The lantern was handed to him, and he plunged with it into the recess.

But before he had time to make any examination, he was startled by loud cries of alarm issuing from the lips of those behind him.

When he first heard these cries he naturally enough jumped to the conclusion that Dick Turpin was the cause of it.

Therefore he drew back with great alacrity.

But at the first glance he saw into how great a mistake he had fallen.

The summer-house was in flames.

So intent had everybody been upon the discovery at the fireplace that the blaze was not at first noticed.

The fire spread, however, with lightning-like rapidity.

The summer-house was, in fact, composed of nothing but wood; and by many long years of exposure to the elements it had become as dry and inflammable as paper.

Even by the time Mr. Skellum had drawn back and taken a first glance the fury of the flames so much increased, and the heat generated was so intense, that all were glad to draw back and make what speed they could across the threshold.

Indeed, had a light been applied to a quantity of shavings, the fire could not have spread with more swiftness and vigour.

The first inquiry was as to the origin of the conflagration; but this was a point upon which they were not long in doubt.

From the spot where the fire had first been observed to break out, it was tolerably clear that the cause lay in the pistol which Mr. Skellum had rather foolishly fired up the chimney.

In all probability, the fire had been communicated by a burning wad falling upon the woodwork, which, once alight, burned with a rapidity that appeared incredible to those who were actually witnesses of it.

To enter the summer-house became in less than a moment an impossibility, and, indeed, so great was the heat that it compelled them, though outside, to retire to a respectful distance.

The unexpectedness of this event produced a great deal of confusion.

As may be expected, Skellum was one of the first to recover.

Yet, by the time he had collected his faculties the summer-house was one mass of flames from top to bottom.

It roared like a furnace, and thousands of sparks flew into the air.

"This is a d—d annoying thing!" were his first words. "Excuse me for saying so, your worship, but what could have been more annoying?"

"I am greatly vexed, I confess," said Sir Humphrey, "for the old place was a great favourite of mine, and I would not willingly have had it destroyed. I am d—nably afraid, too, that it will set fire to some of the trees."

"We will try and prevent that, your worship," replied Skellum, "though the danger is greater than I had at first considered it."

As the trees grew very closely indeed round the summer-house, there was a good deal of fear that the fire would be communicated to them.

Little of an active character could, however, be done.

There was no water near at hand, and no means of getting any from the pool without going first to the Hall to obtain buckets for the purpose.

In the opinion of all present, long before this could be done the summer-house would be reduced to ashes.

The greatest fury of the fire, too, was now over, and as it by degrees abated, the apprehensions that the wood would be fired grew much less.

So rapidly did the whole affair take place that certainly not more than twelve minutes elapsed from the moment when the outbreak of fire was discovered until of the whole nothing remained but a mass of red-hot smouldering embers which cast up dense volumes of smoke.

Mr. Skellum did not value the old summer-house one rush; but he was terribly put about to think such an obstacle should have placed itself in the way of his pursuit of Dick, who, as he rightly dreaded, was by this time far enough off.

Yet where to look for him he knew not.

Nothing had been seen or heard, and the only consolation he could find lay in the reflection that it was just possible Dick was still under earth, unable to emerge in consequence of the conflagration.

That he was doomed to be disappointed in this respect the reader knows well enough already.

About the existence of the recess and knowledge of where it led the baronet professed the most profound ignorance, and Skellum, with all his impudence, did not venture to doubt the truth of what he stated.

So soon as the fire was subdued, or, rather, had exhausted itself for want of further material, he plunged among the ruins and busily set to work to remove the mass of rubbish which had fallen over where the fireplace had stood.

In this rather unpleasant task he was well assisted by his men, who could not for shame's sake hold back when their leader set them the example of working.

Yet it was most difficult, not to say dangerous, for the wood, when it came to be disturbed much below the surface, was red-hot, while clouds of the most suffocating and pungent smoke continued to arise.

The opening had been partially choked up, but not so completely as to prevent Mr. Skellum from seeing that there were steps leading downwards into the earth.

This discovery seemed to impart additional vigour to his movements.

In less time than might be thought the passage was entirely cleared.

He was the first to set the example of descending.

In one hand he held the cutlass with which he had been so busily at work—in the other was the dark lantern.

The cool, fresh air in the subterranean passage was most delightful after the smoke in which they had been working above.

Having the advantage of a light, it by no means took Mr. Skellum so long to make his way along the passage as it had Dick.

In fact, he reached the point where the passage divided in something like half the length of time.

But seeing two paths before him instead of one, Mr. Skellum paused in uncertainty.

Which way to go he knew not.

There was nothing that would serve as any indication of the route the fugitive might have taken.

In this dilemma Mr. Skellum did the wisest thing under the circumstances.

This was to divide the force into two equal portions, allowing one-half to take one direction, the other another.

He himself almost by chance placed himself at the head of those who made their way towards the open air.

When he felt the cool wind fanning his flushed body, Mr. Skellum's apprehensions were increased.

He was sadly afraid that the delay which from one cause or another had taken place had allowed Dick to get off altogether.

But remembering that he had wounded him, these fears considerably abated.

A few more minutes brought him to the end of the passage, and then he found himself about half-way down the side of the dell where Dick had had so narrow an escape from swooning.

Here he found abundant evidence that he was on the right track, for on the ground close by was quite a pool of blood.

This was where Dick had stood while he bound up his wound.

"He must have been here a very few minutes ago, sir," said one of the men; "the blood is quite warm."

Skellum looked keenly around him.

But no signs of the fugitive could he behold.

"There is one comfort," he said, though by the tone of his voice one would have judged that his comfort was small: "a man who has lost such a quantity of blood of his veins as that will not be able to go very far."

[DICK TURPIN IMPLORES SHELTER OF THE FARMER.]

last, so that we shall have him, after all; and when we have really got him secure we shall think little of all the trouble we have had."

"That's true enough, sir," said the man who had before spoken; "and it is a very strange thing to me if we shall not be able to follow in his track with the utmost ease."

CHAPTER MCXVI.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN FINDS UNEXPECTED SUCCOUR.

Dick Turpin staggered on for a long way without once turning his head to look behind him, for all his faculties were absorbed by one idea, and that was, to get as far as he could in as little time as was possible.

Sheer exhaustion, however, at length made him, though most unwillingly, come to a halt.

It was only natural that he should then look back towards the spot he had so lately quitted.

He was instantly startled by the ruddy glow of the sky.

"Something is on fire," he ejaculated. "What is it?"

To this question he was unable to return any certain answer.

He little guessed that it was the old summer-house in course of demolition by fire, and even had he guessed this he would have been far, very far, from thinking that this accidental circumstance had caused so much delay to his pursuers.

But for this chance he could scarcely have failed to be overtaken before he had gone far.

Even now there was the strongest probability that this disaster would ere long befall him.

His weakness was terrible—much greater than he would admit to himself.

While taking his forced rest he seemed to be fully sensible that the longer he stood the weaker he became—the less able he felt to continue his flight.

Without knowing it, he was very close indeed upon swooning from loss of blood.

A sudden effort of the mind, however, enabled him partially and temporarily to shake off this feeling, and he once more staggered on.

His gait and progress were just those of a drunken man.

Every now and then he would reel from side to side, or with a desperate effort steady his swaying form by suddenly taking hold of a contiguous tree.

And, as a matter of course, the more he thus exerted his bodily powers the greater became his exhaustion.

By slow degrees consciousness ebbed from him, yet not to so great an extent as to deprive him of all power of locomotion, though his course was a most random and devious one.

But the uppermost idea in his mind still was that he must keep in motion.

As for his pursuers, he seemed to have forgotten them altogether—at any rate, he did not once pause or cast a single glance behind him.

Under these circumstances, as may be expected, his course was a most erratic one.

Then a mist seemed to come over all things.

Yet he groped blindly forward, like one enveloped in utter darkness.

How long this state continued he had no means of knowing, but most likely it was not for long.

Suddenly the mist before his vision rolled away.

The first object which now attracted his attention was a light.

Feeble, glimmering, and dim it seemed, and far away, yet Dick fixed his eyes upon it with an intentness not to be described.

His hope was that this light was the indication of rest and shelter shortly to be granted to him.

Had his faculties been less confused than they were, he would scarcely have imagined the likelihood of such a thing as this.

As it was, he fancied there was a voice in his heart which whispered to him, urging him to make all speed towards the light.

He did so, and for a time he rallied a little from his faintness.

At last, leaning against the trunk of a tree, he wiped the perspiration from his brow, and endeavoured to take a good outlook in advance.

"It is a fire," he gasped, with the manner of one who finds himself unable to credit the evidence of his senses. "It is a fire—a fire of some kind. What can it be?"

He gazed with more intentness, and to his great joy he found his sight grew clearer.

A wild sensation of joy sprang up in his breast—so wild that it was very near producing the worst circumstances.

"Gipsies," he exclaimed, panting with excitement. "I am sure that's a gipsy encampment yonder. Courage—courage, then—keep your heart up, Dick, and all will yet be well!"

The discovery he had made did indeed exert a remarkable influence upon him.

Under its sway much of his old strength came back to him.

"All will be well—all will be well now," he cried, almost frenzied with joy. "The gipsies have ever shown themselves to be real and true friends of mine. Yes, yes—all will yet be well. My enemies will again be disappointed, for the Zingari, as I know for certain, will run every risk to shield and to protect."

Certainly, if there was anything that would have the effect of restoring vigour to Dick's flagging energies the prospect before him would have been sufficient.

Indeed, an extraordinary accession of strength did come over him, and he made his way towards the light with a precision and a speed that, judging by his former manner, would have been deemed absolutely impossible.

And as he advanced it became abundantly manifest that he had not fallen into any error.

In a short time he was able to make out not only the fire, but three poles placed triangularly above it, from which swung a large iron pot.

Round this were assembled several members of the gipsy tribe.

On one side could be seen a portion of the tents forming their encampment.

More and more animated, Dick struggled on.

But he was obliged to confess that his mind, though for a short time capable of displaying a supremacy over his body, was indeed the weaker of the two, and now it began to yield very perceptibly to his physical faculties.

The goal, however, was almost reached.

A mist, seemingly like blood, would at more and more frequent intervals come before his eyes, but yet it did not hide from his view the point he so strongly wished to gain.

A very little more time now brought him within a few paces of the fire, and not until he had attained this proximity were the gipsies conscious of his presence, so totally were they all absorbed by some matter which they had under discussion.

Dick, too, at this juncture felt that the extent of his powers had been reached.

He knew that his senses were leaving him, yet ere consciousness entirely took its flight he endeavoured to give utterance to his wishes—to make his supplication for their assistance and protection.

But the effort was a vain one.

His attempt to articulate—and it was a desperate one—produced no other result than the expression of a gasping, choking sound, half sob, half sigh.

Then he struggled, and, as it were, seemed to be fighting with himself.

Then he slowly spun round upon his heels, seeming to make frantic efforts to clutch at and hold by the unsubstantial air.

Then finally, with another of those gasping sounds, he fell down heavily on his back upon the sward, where he lay as motionless as death.

So sudden, so unexpected was his appearance — so entirely unprepared were all the gipsies for the occurrence of any such event, that up to this moment they had been absolutely incapable of all motion.

Now, however, as if by general consent, they all sprang up, and, with exclamations of wonder and surprise upon their lips, hurried to the spot where the inanimate stranger lay.

Keen and scrutinising were the glances which they bent upon him, and by the glances they exchanged after having done so it appeared that the new-comer was utterly unknown to them.

But a slim, active youth—the last to appear upon the scene—pressed forward as soon as the rest, having satisfied their curiosity, would allow him to do so.

With great intentness he scanned every lineament, and as he did so there came over his face an expression which seemed to indicate that the rigid features were known to him.

"You have seen this house-dweller before, Sebel?" said a swarthy, powerful gipsy, who stood next to him.

"I have," was the response—"I feel sure I have."

"But where?"

Sebel was silent.

"Can you not remember?"

"I cannot; and yet, stay! I feel convinced—though it is long, long ago—that this stranger once came to us, and on that occasion he was accompanied by one who bore no inconsiderable resemblance to him."

"And what was the object of his visit?"

"Shelter and concealment."

These words were echoed inquiringly and surprisedly by most of those who were standing near, and it was observable that the whole group pressed much more closely onward than before.

The reason was simple.

They were all dominated by the strongest curiosity.

"Yes," said Sebel, emphatically, "I feel sure that I am right—that I make no mistake."

"And was he concealed?"

"He was."

"And broke bread with us?" was the eager inquiry.

"Even so."

"You are sure of this?"

"Quite sure now—quite sure."

"Enough," was the general cry—"we are bound to assist him to the utmost of our power."

"And he badly enough needs aid," continued Sebel. "No doubt, had he been able, he would have called upon us to shield him from his foes."

Although Dick lay so still upon the grass, apparently bereft of life, yet there was not one of those who gazed upon him that was not aware that it was not death, but only death's counterfeit.

"Carry him to the tent," said the gipsy of whom we have made mention. "We will do for him all that lies in our power. If he is not saved, it will be no fault of ours."

Indeed, it was strange to see how unanimous was the opinion that Dick had every claim upon their sympathy while in his present situation, and all because he had, to use their own phrase, broken bread with their tribe, which indeed almost sufficed to make him a member of their strange fraternity.

Accordingly the senseless fugitive was lifted up and carried into the largest tent, where preparations were at once made properly to dress his wound and also to restore him to his senses.

Fortunate indeed was it for Dick that chance had guided his footsteps to this particular place, and that he had strength enough to reach it.

He could not possibly have fallen into better hands.

Many were the secrets possessed by the gipsies in the healing art, especially where hurts and wounds were concerned.

And not only in this respect was it that he was well off.

The gipsies who gave him shelter were, like himself, opposed to the police—their enemy was a common one.

In both of these respects, then, was Dick much better off than he could have dared to hope.

They would defend him to the last gasp, and not only that—they were possessed of all that cunning which has passed into a proverb, and the whole of it would be brought to bear as much in Dick's behalf as it would have been had he actually become a member of their brotherhood.

To recover the fugitive from his state of insensibility was in the first place no easy task, in consequence of the entire prostration of the system, which could be only got the better of in time.

Sensibility was restored for a moment or so, but the recovery was so slight, and was followed so rapidly by a relapse, as to make it scarcely worthy of the name.

"Nature must do her work," said the old crone who officiated as physician for that portion of the tribe. "No art can restore his expended energies; there must be time—time and patience."

But this did not stay her from unbandaging the wound, which upon examination proved to be by no means so serious as was at first thought.

The chief danger consisted in the tremendous quantity of blood which had escaped from it, and from this further ill consequences were to be apprehended.

But the manner in which the old gipsy set about her task would have done the greatest credit to a skilful surgeon.

She had barely finished, however, when a fresh arrival took place.

The new-comer was young, slim, and light of build, but with muscles like wire.

Great excitement was visible in his manner.

He had been running hard, too, as was abundantly manifested by the way in which he panted for breath.

As soon as he could speak he exclaimed:

"Off—off! Strike your tents and depart—linger no longer! Quick—quick!"

An immediate stir followed these words, as though those who heard them fully felt that there was danger to be apprehended and not a moment to be lost.

"What has happened—what is amiss?" asked many eager voices.

"The Robin Redbreasts are abroad," was the reply—"they are forcing a way through dell and brake. Quick—quick! Away—away, or they will be in sight!"

The message was well understood.

At that time, "Robin Redbreast" was a cant name for a police officer—a term which had its origin in the red waistcoat they invariably wore, and which served in lieu of a uniform to distinguish them from other men.

Whether the gipsies had lately been engaged in some transaction which caused them to be in more than usual dread of the officers of justice we know not.

But by the commotion which the delivery of this intelligence occasioned, and the speedy preparations which were made on every side for an immediate and hasty flight, there seemed good grounds for suspecting such to be the case.

In much less time than would be considered requisite for such an undertaking, every article which the gipsies possessed was carefully packed up, the tents were struck, and the horses harnessed to the caravans.

At a given signal the whole started, leaving scarcely a trace behind them to indicate the route which they had taken.

As for poor Dick Turpin, he was as insensible and unconscious of all this as he would have been had death really and truly claimed him for his own.

Perfectly unaware of any such thing, he was carried from the tent to which he had first been taken, and placed in one of the caravans, as those strange yellow-painted houses on wheels are called.

Such an act as this, and the prospect of a journey of indefinite length, would have terribly alarmed a regular practitioner, who would have maintained that perfect repose was absolutely necessary in such a case, and that without it he would not be answerable for the consequences.

But if Dick Turpin had been ever so much averse to such a proceeding as the present, it would have been quite useless, the safety of the tribe being always held paramount above every individual consideration.

As we have said, however, all was one to the fugitive at this time. If the gipsies had chosen to deliver him into the hands of his pertinacious foes, he could not have made the least resistance.

The antagonism, however, which we have mentioned as existing between these two parties made the probabilities of the occurrence of such a danger very slight indeed.

How long a time elapsed since he had quitted the old summer-house, and what had precisely happened to him, Dick Turpin scarcely knew.

He only found it out after his recovery, by dint of much anxious thought and eager questioning.

But about the occurrence of one incident he was in no sort of doubt whatever.

Without knowing how, he discovered that he could hear the sound of conversation going on around him.

At first in a dream-like, semi-conscious way he was sensible of this fact, and barely so, when the pronunciation of his own name struck upon his ears.

That had the effect of immediately startling him.

He opened his eyes to their fullest extent.

Where was he?

That was the anxious question which first of all occurred to him.

He tried to gaze around him.

But in vain.

He was environed by the deepest darkness.

So far as the evidence of his eyes went, therefore, he might just as well have kept them closely shut.

In what situation he was seemed impossible for him to ascertain.

But the darkness appeared to have the effect of sharpening his hearing to a preternatural extent.

He listened, therefore, with great eagerness.

There was to be heard more than sufficient to absorb the whole of his faculties.

The first words which he distinctly heard—or, at least, the first whose import he was able thoroughly to comprehend—were these:

"Let me tell you," said a voice, in very resolute tones, "that you will gain nothing by deceiving us or attempting to do so."

"We don't think about such a thing," was the somewhat surlily-spoken rejoinder, though the voice, Dick was thoroughly persuaded, was one which he had never heard in his life before.

His wonder and anxiety increased.

He had no time to reflect, however, for all his faculties were fully absorbed by listening.

"Then," said the voice which had first spoken, "do you assure us that you have seen no one answering to the description we have given?"

"Have I not spoken?" was the rejoinder.

"You have, but that is not an answer to the question."

"Then, if you will take the word of a gipsy, I tell you we know nothing of the man you seek—we have seen nothing of him."

"That seems strange indeed, and were it not a readier belief would be given. But we have tracked him so very close to where you have lately been that it seems scarcely possible for you not to have seen him."

"We have not done so," was the answer, very firmly and very resolutely given; "nor do we know anything about this highwayman, Dick Turpin, that you speak of. We are on our way to York, near to which city we have to meet another portion of our tribe, and there you will find us if you want to learn anything further."

Some more words passed.

But they were exchanged in so low a tone that Dick was not able to distinguish them.

But the word "gipsy" had, so to speak, struck upon his ears like a keynote.

It furnished him with the clue to past events that he was short of.

He recollected perfectly well what had last occurred, though the profound darkness prevented him from finding out where he was.

The voice which he had first heard was familiar enough to him.

Scarcely anyone could have heard its peculiar harshness without retaining a distinct remembrance of it ever after.

It was Skellum who was speaking.

Although he could not make out a single object, yet in imagination Dick could see plainly enough a large troop of well-armed, resolute police officers standing round.

From what had been said, it seemed quite clear that the gipsies had determined to stand by him.

But would the officers be satisfied with taking what was declared for granted?

The occurrence of this question made him think that he could give a good guess as to where he was.

"Yes, yes," he said, mentally—"during my insensibility, the gipsies became aware of the approach of the officers, and have placed me in some secret place where there is little danger of my being found. All I have to do is to remain perfectly still, and then doubtless all will be well."

Dick's brain was not very clear, or he would not have jumped to conclusions which a little calm reflection would show to be erroneous.

How should the gipsies know that the officers were in pursuit of him, and why should they trouble to hide him when he had given no hint that he required such a service at their hands?

Perhaps it was quite as well, however, that Dick should have settled the matter thus, because it had the effect of inducing him to remain perfectly still, which, under the circumstances, was the one thing needful.

A variety of noises now made themselves heard, and then came the sound of horses' hoofs, mingled with the rumbling of revolving wheels.

The next moment, to Dick's increased surprise, he found himself in motion.

There could be no doubt of the fact.

Of course he was in a vehicle of some kind, but what he could not guess.

The reader may perhaps imagine what anxiety took possession of his mind.

So great was the inclination he felt to look about him that it was only with the utmost difficulty he could control it.

The rumbling and jolting continued.

Where was he?

His uneasiness upon this point at last reached so great a pitch as to be unendurable.

At all hazards he resolved to make an effort to ascertain the nature of his surroundings.

But a very simple thing prevented him.

He tried to rise from the recumbent position in which he found himself.

But all his efforts could not raise his head above a couple of inches, and then he had to allow it to fall back into its old position, so much had the exertion exhausted him.

His alarm consequent upon this discovery was terrible indeed.

The thought that he was so powerless to help himself was a terrible one to bear.

If the officers by chance looked into the conveyance and found him, he would not be able so much as to raise a finger in his defence—his foes would be able to do with him what they pleased.

This prospect was to him such a dreadful one that his heart seemed to congeal into a mass of ice within his breast.

Truly it may be said that there was nothing Dick dreaded so much as falling alive into the hands of his enemies.

He had made up his mind to fling away his life rather than yield himself a living prisoner.

But if they came now, what should he do?

He listened, but with sensations such as cannot be conceived except by one in a similar situation.

He was by no means certain that the police officers were not within a few yards of where he then was, for he had not heard any sound betokening their departure.

It might be that the gipsies had driven on, leaving them in consultation together upon the road, and if this was the case, what was more possible than that the result of their deliberation might be to ride back to the gipsies and insist upon satisfying their doubts by making a strict search?

As these reflections crowded into his mind, Dick became more and more uneasy and alarmed.

CHAPTER MCXVII.

MR. SKELLUM IS COMPELLED TO CONFESS HIMSELF DEFEATED.

A VERY few words will suffice to make the reader acquainted with the movements of the officers after emerging from the secret passage in the hill-side.

No trace of Dick was to be seen; but Skellum was sanguine in his expectations of overtaking him, and therefore commenced a pursuit on foot.

His men, who were terribly fatigued, grumbled a good deal at this, and in order to preserve among them that amount of good feeling without the existence of which his plans could not have been carried out, Mr. Skellum despatched one of their number to the spot where the horses had been left, giving him instructions to mount and bring the rest with him as quickly as possible.

This arrangement being made, there was not much difficulty in persuading those who remained to push forward on foot until they were overtaken by the horses, which would be in a very short time indeed.

They all saw that it was much better for them not to relax their efforts just at that juncture, as it was quite possible Dick was lurking among the bushes close at hand.

To track him, however, was no easy matter, for, having bound up his arm in the way we have described, Dick left no trail of sufficient distinctness for them to follow.

Moreover, what made their task all the more difficult was the very erratic course Dick had taken while half unconscious from loss of blood.

His wanderings had indeed been most perplexing and uncertain.

And yet he had been under the impression, too, that all the time he had been making his way in a perfectly straight direction.

At length, to the great relief of the police officers, to whose fatigue disappointment had not a little contributed, the horses overtook them.

Getting into the saddle, they continued the chase, until at length, when almost ready to give up in despair, they perceived a horse emerge from a lane into the high-road.

Of course a man was with it, and as this was the first chance they had had of speaking to any living being since the time of leaving the subterraneous passage, the officers pressed forward with great eagerness, in the hope of gleaning some intelligence.

They were disappointed, for the horse was one of those belonging to the gipsies, and before the officers could reach the spot the whole of the tribe had debouched into the high-road.

Then ensued that conversation of which Dick had recovered in time to hear the greatest portion.

It may be that the sudden jerk, consequent upon the stoppage of the conveyance, had something to do with producing this result.

The fidelity of the gipsies was extraordinary.

Although made acquainted for the first time with the name of the fugitive to whom they had lent their protection, and although Mr. Skellum particularly dwelt upon the reward which would be paid to anyone who delivered him into the hands of the officers of justice, they remained steadfast and true.

Dick Turpin had broken bread with them, and the peculiar laws which bind their fraternity together would not suffer them to betray him.

After some time Skellum allowed them to proceed, as the reader already is aware, for there was nothing to afford reasonable ground for suspicion in their behaviour

Yet, as he sat upon his horse wondering what step he should take next, and in what direction he should go, he gazed with a strange, indefinable longing after the retiring vehicles until a bend in the road hid them from his view.

Even then, had he chosen to act blindly and wholly from impulse, he would have ridden off after them; but he could find so little, or, rather, no excuse for doing so, that he abandoned the idea altogether.

From this it would almost seem that there was some secret presentiment in his breast, but yet not strong enough to cause him to act in accordance with it.

His men remained for some time silent.

Perceiving that their leader did not move, and that he exhibited some signs of irresolution, one said:

"What are we to do next, Mr. Skellum?"

"I don't know," was the unsatisfactory answer.

There was a pause.

"I am sadly afraid," he continued, "that we have lost him. It is a thousand pities we have done so, for after having lost such an immoderate quantity of blood as we have positive evidence of, it is impossible that he can have got very far away."

"What do you think he has done, then?"

"Why, my own opinion is that he has crawled into some retired nook or other, where we have missed him."

This seemed a very probable supposition indeed, and the opinion was shared in by all without exception.

"It is a thousand pities if he has done so," continued Mr. Skellum, musingly; "because, in the event of it, he will die there, and we shall have no hope of getting recompensed for all the trouble we have been at. In his present condition I feel sure he would not be able to get away again."

Another silence followed, which might have lasted longer than it did had it not been broken by the officer who had been the first to speak in the former instance.

"But what shall we do?" he asked. "I speak for myself, and I think I can do so for all the rest."

"What do you mean—in what way?"

"Why, I am so utterly worn out that I feel every moment as though I must fall off my horse on to the ground."

"And I—and I," answered a chorus of voices.

The men by no means exaggerated, for the duty they had been upon for so long was tiring in the utmost degree.

Mr. Skellum himself was all but worn out; and, indeed, the only thing that had prevented him from giving out before was, that he feared, if he did so, all his previous trouble would go for nothing.

Now, however, there seemed no help for it, and consequently, with much less unwillingness than might have been expected, he agreed to abandon the pursuit for the present and seek rest.

The only consolation he could find lay in the hope that he might chance to have some intelligence brought to him, for the whole country was so alarmed that it was scarcely possible for Dick once to show himself without being recognised.

Accordingly, the whole of the troop repaired to the nearest inn on the high-road, and there refreshed themselves with the food and slumber they were so much in want of.

In the meantime Dick was being gradually carried further and further away from them.

As moment after moment elapsed without making him conscious of any aggressive proceedings on the part of the officers, much of his alarm began to abate.

Yet, before the feeling had quite left him, a fresh and altogether different cause of uneasiness presented itself.

All at once it came into his head that he had heard the gipsies inform the police officers that they were on their way to York.

The confusion of mind he was in when he had heard it, and the anxiety which he had suffered since, had driven this circumstance entirely out of his remembrance.

Now that it occurred to him he wondered greatly how he could have passed it over in the way he had.

Of all places in the world just at that time, York was the very worst that he could be taken to.

His own achievements in the locality were doubtless on every tongue; and the police officers, in their minute inquiries and continual search, had unquestionably circulated a tolerably accurate description of his person.

Should his evil fortune take him to this city, he felt that it would be well-nigh an impossibility for him to escape detection.

So strongly impressed did he become with this idea, that it caused him to resolve to make the attempt to prevent it.

He would call out aloud. There could be no danger in his doing so now that the police were so far behind; and if he made good use of his voice, the gipsies could hardly fail to hear him.

Accordingly, he raised his voice—or rather, he tried to do so, for all his efforts only resulted in the emission of a sound not much above a whisper.

Such a low, hoarse sound could scarcely be heard at a few yards' distance.

How was it likely, then, that it should be audible to the gipsies, who were walking along, conversing busily respecting their encounter with the officers and speculating upon its probable results?

Even had he cried out with the full power of his lungs, it is very doubtful whether it could have been heard above the tremendous grinding and rumbling of the wheels.

Yet Dick tried and tried again and again.

He renewed his efforts to rise, but with less success than before, for his anxiety of mind and previous efforts had greatly exhausted him.

At length, with a weary and heavy sigh, he threw back his half-raised body and gave up in despair.

"It is fate," he murmured—"it is fate."

A strange, drowsy condition followed, during which his thoughts appeared to busy themselves without being under his control.

Looking back to the past, he was struck with the fatality which had hitherto attended his efforts to get away from York.

He could almost fancy that he was under the influence of some spell or charm.

And now, on this last occasion, when he had, as he thought, bidden adieu to the old city for ever, yet here he was being brought back to it, and in a way that it was in vain for him to attempt to resist.

"It is fate," he murmured again—"I feel that it is fate. I shall attempt to leave it no more."

A commotion of voices and a sudden jerk awoke him from what we may call his waking dream.

Where was he?

On this point he was not destined to remain for very long in ignorance.

After the lapse of a few minutes the door at the hind part of the caravan was opened, and a gleam of light appeared.

"Hullo, there!" said a gruff voice. "Are you awake there?"

Conceiving the question must be addressed to him, Dick replied:

"Yes—yes."

But his voice was so weak as to be scarcely audible

"Here, Cazza," said the gruff voice—"I told you you were troubling yourself about nothing. Come in—he's all right."

Another person now entered the caravan; and directly afterwards Dick caught sight of an old woman, whose appearance was so repulsive that he could scarcely repress the loathing which her appearance excited

She bent down over him, while her companion held the light, and looked at him attentively.

"He is bad," she said, at length, shaking her head to and fro while she spoke—"very bad. He has been struggling and chafing since I left him."

Dick tried to speak, but all utterance failed him.

The old woman then produced a cup containing some dark liquor, and without speaking a word she placed this to Dick's lips and poured it into his mouth.

To save himself from choking he was obliged to swallow; but a more nauseous potion he thought had never been administered.

But ere half an hour had elapsed he experienced the virtues of it.

Upon making the attempt, he found himself not only able to lift his head, but even to raise himself to a sitting posture.

His voice, too, had been restored to him.

Some moments, however, were occupied in looking around him, at the many strange things which presented themselves to view on every side.

The caravan was crowded with articles of every conceivable description, many of them such as he had never seen before.

The place, too, was not without a certain air of comfort.

He was interrupted by the entrance of the youth Sebel.

Dick did not recognise him at first, though he was instantly aware that he had somewhere seen him in times long past.

"Who are you?" he asked. "Your face is strongly familiar to me."

"Have you forgotten me? My name is Sebel."

"Sebel—Sebel!" repeated Dick, like one who is taxing his memory.

"I find you have forgotten me. But when you came before another was with you, who—who——"

Dick smiled, and extended his unwounded arm.

"I recollect, now," he said—"recollect quite well. I am deeply grateful. Tell me where I am, and what has happened."

With the last portion of his request the gipsy-boy readily complied.

Dick congratulated himself upon having had strength sufficient to reach this place of safety.

"And we are at York now?"

"Not in the city," was the response; "though our tents are not far from it."

Dick's face clouded.

"I must get away," he said. "I cannot remain here. I am not safe."

"Yes, yes; quite safe. Have no concern on that score."

"But the officers——"

"We will not betray you; not one would do it, were the reward ten times what it is."

"You shall all be rewarded for your fidelity. But if my foes came, would they not find me?"

"No no; do not make yourself uneasy on that account. We could hide you where they would never find you."

This was satisfactory enough, and Dick drew a long breath of exquisite relief, for he knew enough of the manners of these wandering people to feel certain that if they chose to protect him he should be safe.

"But there is another point," he continued, "upon which I suffer much uneasiness."

"What is it, captain?"

"About my wound."

"I——"

"Hush! I want you to tell me truthfully and honestly what kind of a wound it is, and what is the probable extent of danger?"

"To speak the entire truth, then, captain, Cazza considers it a very bad flesh wound."

"There is no bone broken, then?"

"None, captain."

"That's a relief indeed."

"But she says you are in a great state of exhaustion, and that it will take time and care to bring you round."

"And she thinks she can do it?"

"She is certain; that is, if you will assist her by keeping your mind as calm as you can."

"And how long will it take, under favourable circumstances?"

"Many days."

Dick sighed.

At this moment Cazza entered, and peremptorily put an end to the conversation.

Upon first hearing that some time must elapse before his recovery, Dick had felt inclined to repine, but a moment's consideration went very far towards convincing him that he ought to rejoice instead.

Upon the word of the boy Sebel he put an absolute trust.

Safety, then, was secured to him, and if he continued any length of time concealed, without the officers being able to scent it out, the vigour of their pursuit would be much diminished, and his chances of getting to the sea coast much increased.

The only point was, would the officers find him?

If so, they would come upon him in a defenceless state indeed.

When three days passed, however, without the occurrence of anything to disturb him, his mind grew greatly calmer, and consequently his recovery was proportionably rapid.

Freedom from excitement—absolute rest, both of mind and body—was what he required; and this he had to perfection.

It was on the fourth evening that, feeling almost well, he was sitting up, when the sound of voices engaged in conversation came upon his ears.

Having nothing else to occupy his thoughts, and believing that nothing could take place in or about the gipsy encampment that was not of interest to him, he listened.

He soon found out that he was able to distinguish the words uttered tolerably well; and as they continued to be borne to his ears, his interest wonderfully increased.

"Think again," said a voice—"think again, before you reply either way to what I have proposed."

Dick started at the sound, for he was confident that he knew the speaker.

For a short time, however, his identity baffled him.

"I have thought," was the response.

About the identity of this person, however, Dick had no doubts.

It was the man who held what may be called a kind of chieftainship over this portion of the Zingari tribe.

"Well, wait a moment, and I will go over the ground again. Listen!"

"I——"

"Listen, I say!"

The gipsy was silent.

His companion then, in a voice of suppressed excitement, spoke as follows:

"There is no risk to you in the affair, none whatever, and scarcely any difficulty. All that I want is some one of your number—I don't care who—to personate the heir to some property; and I want some others to say that he entered your ranks when about twenty years of age—that he had then every appearance of a gentleman, and only joined you in consequence of some great disappointment in life and reverse of fortune. Do you understand that?"

"Yes, perfectly; but——"

"Stay! Reserve your objections for the present. This young man being found, he will have to come forward and keep to a tale which I shall take care to have him informed of. I will see to lawyers and all that part of the business, and can so arrange it that with moderate care he will have no difficulty in proving himself to be the missing heir of the property. I will take care to furnish him with the papers."

"But——"

"Nay, I have not finished. For this you shall receive any reward you may think fit to demand—such an amount as will enable you and the rest of your tribe to live in independence during the remainder of your existence, instead of continuing your present precarious livelihood."

The man paused, as though he wished the offer he had just made to sink deeply into the mind of his hearer.

It was at this moment that Dick discovered who this person was.

It was the villain whose schemes for Milly's misery Dick had so signally defeated—in a word, no other than Lord Crake.

To find him in a gipsy's tent surprised Dick in no slight degree.

But he did not stop then to indulge in any reflections or speculations.

He concentrated all his faculties to listen, for now that he had found out who the tempter was, he felt a double interest in every syllable.

"And what else?" asked the gipsy.

"Nothing."

"Nothing?" was the reply, echoed in no little astonishment. "How nothing? Supposing the scheme to succeed, what will become of this young man then?"

"I will tell you that, though I had not at first thought of doing so. He will come into possession of all the property, and then he will sell it to me."

"Sell it to you?"

"Yes. That is, a document will be drawn up by which he will sell it me for half its value, and this will be the reward I mentioned."

"I don't see it," said the gipsy. "I can't see my way clear at all."

"Not see your way clear?"

"No, I cannot. You are telling me half a story. Take me altogether into your confidence. Tell me all from first to last."

"And supposing after I have done so, and you thought fit to decline, what guarantee should I have that you would not come forward and defeat me by laying bare my scheme?"

"I can give you no other guarantee than a gipsy's word. If that is not sufficient, leave me, and there will be an end of the matter."

A silence followed, during which Dick supposed Lord Crake was busily debating within himself.

The gipsy was the first to speak.

"I have only this addition to make," he said, "and that is, if you tell me all and show me that it is safe to make the trial, I will join with you. The house-dwellers never pity the gipsy, and why should I pity them?"

"Very true," said Lord Crake, with an amount of triumphant satisfaction that he could not conceal. "There is no reason why you should show them any extra consideration. Give me your hand upon it."

"You will tell me all?"

"I will, and satisfy you that success is certain."

"I must know all," repeated the gipsy, persistently.

"I will begin at the beginning and end with the end," was the rejoinder; "though I promise you the story is a long one."

"I have nothing else better to do than to listen to it."

"And is there anyone to overhear us?" asked Lord Crake, suspiciously.

"No one."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite."

"Well, then, I will commence. Listen!"

We fancy this last injunction was a superfluous one to the gipsy, and quite certain that it was entirely so to Dick, who felt that he would not miss hearing any portion of the narrative that was about to be given for worlds.

In a low, monotonous, but perfectly distinct voice, Lord Crake then said:

"To convince you that I am about to take you wholly into my confidence, I shall not even alter or suppress a single name."

"It is better so," said the gipsy, quietly. "Half confidences are always dangerous."

"The name, then, of the Marquis of Belgarde must be quite familiar to you."

Upon hearing this, Dick started and almost betrayed himself by giving utterance to an ejaculation.

What name could be better known to Dick?

In an instant it brought before him his true old comrade Tom King.

But he could not stay to think, for, the gipsy having given an assent, Lord Crake continued:

"You may be aware, too, that it came out that in his youth this marquis had married much beneath his station."

"He did. He married——"

The gipsy checked himself.

"Who—who?"

"One of our tribe—I shall say no more."

He pronounced his determination so firmly that Lord Crake did not repeat his query.

"Well, growing tired of her, the marquis left her, and some years after married again. The first wedding was such a private one and the secret so well kept that not more than three knew of it. This first wife, a silly fool, possessed with all manner of foolish notions about devotion and generosity to the man she loved, would not make known the marriage nor take any steps to obtain a restitution of her rights. Only on her deathbed did she reveal her rank."

"She had a son, had she not?"

"Yes, a wild reprobate; but yet, with the perversity of womankind, she loved him proportionately to his ill-treatment of her. She told him what and who he was."

"What followed?"

"After her death he at once resolved to regain his own."

"He was successful?"

"He was; and the young heir that was—his half-brother—suddenly found himself deprived of the snug fortune which up to then he had thought his own."

"What became of him?"

"He fled, nor could he ever afterwards be found. He was traced to London, and there all trace of him was lost."

"And do you want some one to personate this missing man?"

"I do."

Here was another surprise for Dick, for that Tom King was the individual referred to was beyond all possibility of doubt.

His listening powers were still in demand.

"A few words will let you into the secret of the rest. This new-found heir, who had passed all his life among the crime and low life of London, had no other way of showing his appreciation of the good fortune that had befallen him than by drinking all the best and most expensive drinks his money could procure. The quantity he swallowed is incredible, and the end such as anyone might have foretold. The young girl he married, and who only accepted him because of his wealth and title, soon died broken-hearted, some said; but others—and most likely they are right—whisper that her death was brought on by her husband's brutality."

CHAPTER MCXVIII.

DICK TURPIN FINDS HIMSELF INVOLVED IN FRESH DANGERS.

LORD CRAKE paused a little, as if for breath, or else in order to nerve himself for what more he had to say, and then continued:

"On dying, this coroneted blackguard made a will, the terms of which were as outrageous as his whole life. He bequeathed everything to his illegitimate brother—for so he was, the late earl's second marriage being no marriage at all; and not only that, as there was some doubt as to whether this precious fellow should be found, made a proviso that the whole of the property should go to the daughter of Sir Humphrey Yeomans."

At the mention of this last name the gipsy gave utterance to an angry curse, and lucky was it that he did so, for it drowned the slight exclamation which was forced from Turpin's lips before he was aware of it.

"What's the matter?" asked Lord Crake.

"Never mind—go on!"

"In a minute. Why did you let out that exclamation when I pronounced his name?"

The gipsy was silent.

"It must be that you hate him."

"Perhaps I do. But never mind—go on!"

"Not till you have told me."

"Well then," cried the gipsy, vindictively, "I do hate him—he has always been a bitter, unrelenting foe to all our tribe."

Lord Crake chuckled, for this was a lucky discovery.

"Enough," he said. "Now comes the rest of the tale.

I will tell you without reserve. From particular inquiries which I caused to be made, I came with tolerable certainty to the conclusion that this missing heir would never be found. Accordingly, this girl would reap the benefit, and I determined to make her my wife. I fancied I should succeed. Her parents readily consented to the match, I was received as an accepted lover, and congratulated myself that all was well. But the girl I knew did not like me, though I tried to vanquish her dislike. It was in vain, however, and her father, who was foolish enough to pay regard to her whims, came to me and stated that the match must be broken off. Nothing I could say had the least effect upon his resolution, which was inflexible."

"So you were defeated, then?"

"I was, but I vowed to be successful still, and, what is more, to have my revenge upon the minx."

"How so?"

"Why, by finding some one that I could palm off as the missing heir to the estates. And think how simple the affair will be! You have only to pitch upon some one who can play the part in a suitable manner. You can say that he came to you, took the oath, and was received as a member of your tribe."

"But will that be enough?" asked the gipsy, doubtfully.

"For you it will; and as for the other proofs, you must leave them to me, and take my word that they shall be forthcoming."

"And you hope for success?"

"I am certain of it, provided you perform your part of the contract."

"Do you want my decision now?"

"I do."

"But how if I am unable to find a suitable person?"

"I am not afraid of that, for by your manner I am almost satisfied that you have your eye upon some one already."

"But he may not consent."

"You must explain matters to him, and make him understand how much he will be the gainer."

"To tell you the truth," said the gipsy, "that is the only part of it I don't like."

"How?"

"Why, I think you must have some further design in your head."

Lord Crake laughed.

"If you have any ultimate plot in your head to defraud us after you have made us your tools, beware! Take my advice—do not attempt it, or you will suffer dearly, for it will be a matter in which the whole tribe will join, and you will find it impossible to escape the vengeance of so many. If you have thought of such a thing, for your own sake I implore you to abandon the idea this moment."

"What puts such a ridiculous thing into your head?" asked his lordship, forcing a laugh.

"The terms you propose to us seem to be too good—the prospect is too glittering."

"A fine notion that! But let me tell you your fears are groundless."

"I am glad to hear it."

The gipsy spoke as though he was thoroughly in earnest, and no doubt he was so.

"I mean well by you," said Lord Crake, "and the reason is that the property is quite large enough to bear a division, and yet leave me as much as I require. And now to go back to Sir Humphrey Yeomans and his daughter. After the insult I have received at their hands it is only natural that I should look to be revenged—and will it not be vengeance to deprive her of this?"

"Give me your hand," said the gipsy. "I will go through with you in this business—not so much on account of the money which is to be gained by it, but rather because I should like to wring the baronet's proud heart—no easy thing to do, as I daresay you are aware. But his daughter is his tender point."

"It is—it is!" answered Lord Crake, with the same amount of vindictiveness in his tones as he had displayed on a former occasion.

Then he muttered:

"It will go hard with me if my revenge does not reach further than this!"

"What do you say?"

"Nothing—nothing. Am I to look upon this business as being settled?"

"You may rely upon me. If I fall short, it will be through no fault of mine."

"Do not mention failure. With moderate care we must succeed, so never think of failure."

By the sound which now reached his ears, Dick could tell that his lordship had risen to his feet, and consequently that the conference was over.

He listened, however, in the hope that he might hear yet a few words more.

In this expectation he was defeated.

He caught only the sound of their retreating footsteps.

Satisfied that they had left, Dick Turpin gave himself up to those reflections to which what he had overheard could not fail to give birth.

"How wonderful," he murmured—"how truly wonderful! Who could have believed that I, of all others, should overhear this nice little plot? Sir Humphrey will have no occasion to regret having acted towards me as he did. I could have wished for nothing better than the opportunity of rendering them such a service as now lies within my power."

But even as these words escaped him, he was suddenly reminded of the great extent to which he was indebted to the gipsies.

They had unquestionably saved his life at a moment when he was very near indeed to losing it—when he must have perished but for their assistance.

Then, they had refused to hand him over to the police when the temptation to do so was very strong indeed.

In laying bare the conspiracy of which he had been an auditor, he must, of course, implicate them, or, at the very least, be the means of bringing about their defeat.

This was embarrassing, because, although in the wrong, yet it was ill requiting them for what they had done on his behalf.

Dick's hesitation, however, did not long continue.

His old comrade's memory and Milly's welfare overbalanced all consideration he was inclined to show the gipsies on the grounds we have mentioned.

He must place himself in antagonism with one or the other, and there was everything to induce him to resolve that no effort on his part should be wanting to prevent the consummation of so monstrous a fraud.

"Tom cannot enjoy those possessions himself," he said; "but next to doing so would be the satisfaction that they had fallen into the hands of so worthy an object as the baronet's daughter. As for Lord Crake, if by chance we should ever meet, he will find that there will be an account to settle between us."

This discovery, of course, set Dick's mind in a state of furious tumult again, nor could he for the life of him subdue it.

But he was stronger now, and much better able to withstand the effects of any excitement.

As the gipsy-boy, Sebel, had correctly informed him, his hurt was nothing more than a flesh wound, which, under the care of the old sibyl Cazza, rapidly grew well.

Nature herself recovered him from the effects of the vast quantity of blood he had lost—indeed, Dick thought himself quite well, though he vastly overrated his strength.

"What steps shall I take?" he asked himself. "How shall I act for the best in this matter? How powerless I am! With such a look-out as is doubtless kept against me, it will be the most difficult thing in the world for me to do that which another ordinarily situated would accomplish with all the ease imaginable."

He ceased speaking, but his thoughts continued to be busily enough employed.

But deciding upon a definite line of action in such a matter was of no ordinary difficulty.

"Ah!" he said, struck by a sudden thought which seemed to promise him a ready solution of his difficulty, "let me think—let me tax my memory. Tom named some solicitors or other in York to whom he would have to apply. Who were they? What on earth could have been their names?"

He taxed his memory vainly. The names were lost.

But thinking back upon the events of the past brought to his recollection the circumstance that, as a matter of precaution, Tom had requested him to make a memorandum of these names.

[DICK TURPIN RECEIVES IMPORTANT INFORMATION FROM THE OSTLER.]

He at once began to fumble in his pockets, though with very small hopes of finding what he sought.

But in an inner breast pocket of his coat he found a beautifully-bound gilt-edged pocket-book, which had no doubt belonged to a person of considerable distinction.

Opening this with eager haste, Dick turned over the vellum leaves until he came to one whereon was written, in very straggling, ill-formed letters, the following words:—

"Messrs. Flint and Steel,
"Solicitors.
"York."

"That is it!" he almost cried aloud, so great was his exultation at this unhoped-for discovery. "There is no street mentioned, as I could have wished; but I must do my best to find them out. I shall manage it now I know their names."

Again he paused.

"I will go to these men, although I have little reason enough to be fond of lawyers; but I will go to them—it is my duty. And if in the execution of it I should lose my life, what matters it?—what is existence that I should value it so highly?"

But many obstacles stood in the way of achieving such a simple matter as this.

How was he to leave the gipsy encampment.

If he could do so secretly, it would be so much the better.

A moment's thought, however, showed him that this was impossible, so he abandoned the idea at once.

Before he had settled anything, the principal object of his thoughts—that is to say, the gipsy himself—entered the caravan.

How to treat him, Dick was at a loss to decide; and the worst of it was, a very short time was allowed him to make up his mind in.

Should he admit that he had overheard the plot, and endeavour to persuade him to change his determination?

No; that would be useless, because by the custom of the tribe what word is given must be stood to.

"I owe you many thanks," said Turpin, at length, a slight amount of hesitation manifesting itself. "But I fancy I shall be able to reward you, though not as you deserve, nor as I could wish."

"Say no more about that," answered the gipsy. "Do you find yourself much better?"

"Wonderfully better—so much so that I think I shall try to rid you of me to-night."

"Nay, nay—think not of such a thing."

"Yes," said Dick—"it is imperative."

"But you are not strong enough to walk a dozen paces."

"So you think."

"I am certain of it. You would be mad to think of attempting to go a journey to-night."

"But it is imperative," said Dick. "I have business on hand which will not bear even an hour's delay."

"At any rate, stay till to-morrow," said the gipsy, earnestly. "I should be sorry for you to fall into the hands of your enemies after having baffled them so far. And let me tell you they have by no means given over the pursuit. They seem certain you are hidden somewhere, and believe they have only to wait long enough and you will show yourself."

"Is it so?" said Dick.

"I assure you of it."

"To-morrow night, then, is the utmost limit to which I can prolong my stay. I may as well fall into the hands of my foes as fail in that which wholly depends upon me."

"You are welcome," said the gipsy. "But you know best. You are free to do as you list; and, what is more, be sure the tribe will always aid you to whatever extent lies in their power."

"Many thanks!" said Dick, who at this moment was very near acknowledging that he had overheard Lord Crake's conspiracy.

But he took a second thought, and remained silent.

What more passed had no special interest.

The night elapsed without the least alarm, though Dick's impatience made each hour seem three.

The day seemed to pass even more tediously; but Dick had made up his mind just what to do, and towards noon he fell sound asleep.

His intention may be expressed very briefly.

It was to make his way to York, ascertain the residence of the solicitors, and disclose to them all that he had by chance become acquainted with.

How simple this appeared, and yet what tremendous danger Dick would incur by attempting to carry it into effect!

Had it been ten times as great, however, it would not have prevented Turpin from executing his resolve.

It was dusk when he awoke.

He started up suddenly, for he was surprised to find so many hours had passed away.

The first object upon which his eyes rested was the form of the gipsy chief.

It was quite possible that the slight sound made by him in entering the caravan had abruptly terminated the slumber of the fugitive.

"So late!" were Dick's first words.

"Time enough," was the laconic answer. "It is not dark enough for you to leave our tents; and, remember, if you were seen departing we should have to pay very dearly for having sheltered you."

"I know that, and for my own sake shall be careful not to compromise you—I owe you too deep a debt of gratitude."

The gipsy made no reply to this speech save by nodding his head.

Then he showed Dick a cup which he held carefully in one hand.

"Cazza has sent you this," he said. "It is a cordial of rare efficacy and virtue. It will give fresh strength to your flagging limbs. The effects will not be permanent, of course," he added, "but you will experience great benefit from the draught."

Dick took the draught which was offered him.

It was three-parts full of some dark-coloured decoction.

As he received it a momentary doubt crossed his mind.

Did it mean treachery?

Would the effects of the potion be precisely opposite to those declared?

Was it a plan to deliver him to his foes?

His suspicions lasted but a second.

He was instantly struck with the reflection that if it was the intention of the gipsies to betray him, they had had abundant opportunities for doing so, and no reason to show why they should have aided him thus far.

With a feeling in his heart that he had done his benefactors a deep wrong by allowing such a thought to enter his breast, he placed the cup to his lips and drained it of its contents without either hesitation or dread of the result.

Almost as soon as he had swallowed the last drop he became sensible of its invigorating properties.

His heart beat with stronger and more regular pulsations, forcing the blood through every vein, while an oppressive load seemed suddenly lifted off his mind.

"You feel the effects?" said the gipsy, interrogatively.

"I do indeed."

"Before you start, eat heartily. Who can say how long it will be before you have the opportunity of making another meal?"

"True," said Turpin—"very true. But I must leave at dark."

"That will not be for half an hour to come, at the very least; so make yourself easy until then."

The gipsy's considerate advice was carefully acted upon.

Dick had a very large amount about his person, consisting of money and valuables of various kinds.

From this store he amply satisfied the tribe, who had little anticipated such liberality.

"And now," said the gipsy chief, "if you want a horse there is a good one at your service. You will find it easy travelling; I don't think you have strength enough to walk far."

"I feel the strength of a hundred men."

"That is from the draught; but I warn you the effect will not last. Let me advise you to take the horse."

But Dick very firmly and decidedly shook his head.

"You have my thanks just the same," he said, "but I have made up my mind to go on foot. In this case I shall not run so much risk of observation; moreover, I am not going far."

"You know your own business best; but still, I should recommend you not to decline my offer."

"I will tell you my great reason for doing so," said Dick, with a peculiar smile. "But when Black Bess staggered and fell dead beneath me, I made up my mind as I had prevented her from having another master, so would I refuse to cross the back of another steed. And when I even contemplate doing so, may I be immediately visited by some great misfortune!"

The gipsy saw nothing strange or unaccountable in this—on the contrary, the feeling was one which he could perfectly comprehend.

"The fear is a vague one," added Dick, "but yet I might find some other animal that would supplant my poor mare in my affections. I have had no other steed, and I will have no other."

By the time he had expressed this determination, the time for departure had arrived.

Darkness completely shrouded all things, and under the cover of it Dick hoped to be able to elude the utmost vigilance of his foes.

On quitting the encampment, Dick did not make his way towards York, though he had been careful to inquire in what direction the city lay.

As soon as he felt certain, however, that he was out of sight of the encampment, he changed his course, and walked as nearly as he could judge in a straight line to his destination.

The vigour imparted by the strengthening draught deceived him, and produced disastrous results.

Overrating his powers, he was not content with making his way at a moderate speed, but hurried on at a pace much too fast to be called a walk and yet by no means a run.

It proved, however, to be a most exhaustive one; and before he had proceeded three-quarters of a mile on his journey he was obliged to come to a halt.

He was dead-beat; and that new-found strength in which he had so much rejoiced left him weaker than before.

He struggled on for some distance further; but every yard cost him a tremendous effort, for he was reduced to such a deplorable state of weakness that a child's strength would have been almost enough to overcome him.

The knowledge of his condition filled him with the greatest apprehensions lest his pursuers should chance to obtain a clue to his whereabouts.

To make his position still worse, the moon rose; and though she was some days past the full, yet, as the heavens were almost free from clouds, she cast around her a much greater amount of light than Turpin wished to have.

"I must rest," he said—"I must rest. Perhaps if I remain perfectly still for a little while my spent strength will in some degree return to me. It was thoughtless of me—most thoughtless to act as I have. I ought to have husbanded my strength with the utmost care."

But this after-wisdom had now no practical good.

He flung himself down, however, upon the smooth turf in a meadow, having taken care to choose a spot that was cast into deep shadow by a belt of trees.

Here he remained he knew not how long, for he did not trouble himself to take notice of the flight of time.

As soon as he felt somewhat recovered he arose.

The moon was shining, as it seemed to him, with additional brilliancy; but perhaps this was caused by his suddenly coming out of the shadow of the trees.

Slowly and gently, he recommenced his journey, carefully avoiding all roads or frequentated paths.

Slight as the exertion was, ere long it told greatly upon him.

In a little time he was compelled to rest, and as he wearily dragged himself onwards these rests became more and more frequent.

"I shall never reach York before daylight," he murmured, at last, in a weak voice. "I find it will be impossible. What shall I do? Where shall I look for a place where I can remain without much fear of being found by the police officers?"

He looked all around him, as though in the hope that his eyes would light upon the place he needed.

It was in vain.

He was evidently upon some farmer's land, for everywhere around the land was carefully cultivated, and here and there could be seen some implement of husbandry.

"There must be a homestead not far off," Dick said at length. "Shall I venture to make my way there? I fancy I have no better chance. Farmers have the general reputation of being good-natured and generous, and so I have found them, I think, without exception. Who knows—I may be fortunate enough to find a friend."

This was very far indeed from being likely, yet Dick felt it no slight consolation to keep the prospect of such a thing before his mind.

Just then he came to a kind of beaten track, which, by its character, seemed as though it led towards the farmhouse.

He walked along it, not so much, perhaps, with the view of making his way to the door of the habitation and asking shelter as with the idea that he might reach some shed or other outbuilding where he could repose his wearied limbs.

The ground had an upward tendency for some distance; but when the level was gained Dick saw before him at no great distance a confused mass of thatched roofs, no doubt covering the homestead.

Very beautiful and very peaceful did the scene look in the silvery moonlight—so calm, so suggestive of happiness, contentment, freedom from care or danger, that as the fugitive gazed upon it his feelings mastered him.

A choking sob rose in his throat, and for a moment or two the quiet scene was hidden from him by a mist of heart-wept tears.

CHAPTER MCXIX.

DICK TURPIN IS RECOGNISED ON HIS ARRIVAL AT THE FARM.

THE prospect before Dick Turpin, so full of peacefulness as it was, made the misery of his own existence all the more palpable from the contrast.

It was no wonder that, especially in his present enfeebled state, he should be overcome by his feelings.

As soon as he recovered himself a little, he stretched out his arms yearningly towards the humble abode, and, in a broken voice, exclaimed:

"What perfect happiness, what freedom from all worldly care, must be the fortunate lot of those who dwell yonder! Life to them must be a calm and pleasant river, down which they float with a gentle, ebbing tide. Now life to me has in it no touch of enjoyment or of peace—hunted from place to place like a wild beast, allowed no rest, deprived of the opportunity of doing good when it lies in my power. All is war—nothing but war, which, even in my case, is productive of the utmost misery. Oh! if I could only once more gain that sequestered spot where one-half of my heart lies buried beneath the churchyard sod, I should be happy—I should be content, unenvying the most brilliant destiny which mortal ever enjoyed upon this earth! Oh! if I could only reach it—if I could only reach it!"

The last words were pronounced with a fervent earnestness which cannot be expressed—nothing could be more ineffable.

This mention of the little village on the French sea-coast, however, so far from increasing his dejection, had a precisely opposite effect.

His breast immediately became filled with the hope of reaching this place in a little time; and the next words which passed his lips consisted of a strong determination to brace up every nerve, to redouble all his efforts, to satisfy this anxious longing.

"I will do it," he exclaimed—"yes, even if the number of my foes was doubled—even if ten times as many obstacles lay before me in my path! I will render, first of all, this great service to the fair girl who, out of the gentleness of her sweet nature, afforded me protection when I so badly needed it, and then, despite the endeavours of all the police officers in the kingdom, I will fight my way to the sea-shore, embark, and remain at rest."

He was silent for a few moments.

Then, with a firmer and steadier footfall than he had yet employed, he made his way towards the homestead.

But the new-found vigour imparted by excitement vanished soon, and again and again he was compelled to rest.

At last, after a tedious lapse of time, he reached one of the outlying sheds—a place used for a variety of purposes, but now it chanced to be almost filled with straw.

Upon this Dick flung himself with an over-weary sigh, and almost instantly consciousness abandoned him.

He fancied that certainly not more than a moment elapsed before he was startled by the rough tones of some strange voice.

Opening his eyes quickly, he saw that there was a dull gray light visible.

"Can it be dawn?" he asked himself, mentally.

The strange voice reached his ears again.

"I won't have these horses here—don't I tell you so! Take them off at once!"

"Yes, meester—I'll be with you momently."

What a sigh of relief it was that Dick gave utterance to when these words fell upon his sense of hearing!

The danger that he so much feared was not present.

His natural thought on awaking was that his enemies were close by.

When he found that this was not the case he moved.

Although the movement was slight, it caused him an infinity of pain, for all his joints seemed stiffened as if with gout.

He was, too, very—very cold.

But he moved again, though the agony it caused almost wrung a groan from his lips.

Nothing save motion, however, would restore the arrested circulation of his blood, and the sooner this was over the better.

Still it required him to call up all the fortitude he was master of.

At length he emerged from the straw-filled shed, and, standing upright by dint of clinging to the woodwork, he looked about him.

The first objects upon which his eyes fell were those of a tall, burly-looking man and a couple of horses.

Doubtless these were the animals to which he had alluded, for they were munching at a quantity of hay.

"The occupier of this place, no doubt," thought Dick. "Surely, with all this prosperity around him, he will be filled with compassion as soon as he beholds such a miserable wretch as I am now! I will drag myself towards him—I will ask for shelter and protection."

Dick moved but languidly and with difficulty, but the farmer saw him not, his whole attention apparently being absorbed by a man who was at work at a little distance.

But, suddenly turning round, he caught sight of Dick within a few paces of him.

The start he gave upon making this discovery had something ludicrous in it.

Dick leaned himself against the side of the building where the horses stood.

He was so giddy and faint that without this support he must have fallen to the ground.

The farmer, recovering from his first shock of surprise, bent upon him a gaze that held out very little prospect of a friendly reception.

He did not speak, but scanned Dick from head to foot.

The appearance of the fugitive was by no means recommendatory, for the vicissitudes Dick had recently experienced had by no means improved his looks.

"Have mercy!" said the fugitive, feebly—"have mercy and pity, for, as you see, I am in want of both!"

"I don't know you!" growled the farmer. "Who are you?—what do you want?"

"Nothing more than a few hours' shelter," answered Dick, replying only to the last query, for he saw it would be useless to make an appeal for much hospitality.

"Take it, then," was the reply, spoken with a harsh voice. "I don't encourage vagrants as a rule, but as you look ill, and seem as though you had known better days, I don't mind letting you lie down on the straw yonder for an hour or two. But when you are rested you must troop off—I'll have no such varmint as you about the farm. Mind that!"

And with this he turned on his heel and walked with a swift step towards the man whose movements he had been watching.

Dick heaved another sigh.

"And is this churl the fortunate inhabitant of this reposeful place? How unworthy of it! All its charms are unappreciated by him. How strange such beings should be so fortunate! Lie down in the straw! Well, well—perhaps that is more consideration than many would have shown me."

Dick had to pause a minute or two, leaning against the boarding of the shed, before he could recover himself sufficiently to crawl back into the place he had just left.

But his heart was heavy with disappointment.

He had filled himself up with the idea that the inmates of the farm-house would willingly have done all they could to alleviate his distress.

Of all the disappointments he could remember having experienced, not one seemed half so bitter as this.

With more dejection than he had yet displayed, he cast himself down again upon the straw.

It was not long, though, before inherent pride came to his aid, and enabled him to shake off the depression of spirits under which he laboured.

He then found it some relief to pour out his resentment against the churlish farmer, although there was no one near to interrupt him.

He was interrupted by hearing some one coming.

This circumstance, of course, took his attention instantly.

But whatever uneasiness he may have experienced was dispelled when he saw that it was a shock-headed urchin—one of the oddest-looking creatures it had ever been his lot to behold.

His age might have been guessed at fourteen—it may have been more, but was probably less.

He was attired in a kind of white smock frock, which left no part of his person visible from his neck to his ankles.

As he approached, he was amusing himself by whistling some extraordinary melody.

It would seem as though he had been sent on some errand to the very shed under the roof of which Dick lay.

The boy little expected to see a stranger there. His distended cheeks collapsed, and the whistling ceased as if by magic.

But he recovered himself almost instantly, and with an odd mixture of audacity and awkwardness, he came nearer to Dick in order to indulge his curiosity by a closer view.

Upon coming as near as he probably thought was consistent with prudence he stopped, and indulged himself with a good stare.

"Who be ye?" he asked, at length.

Dick, who had been looking closely at the new-comer, saw that beneath his rough exterior there was a certain amount of sharpness and intelligence, though most would have called it cunning.

He fancied, also, that he could perceive something like an air of friendliness about him.

But this might have been fancy, for never before had Dick felt such a strong, irresistible craving for companionship.

"Who be ye?" said the boy, again, after waiting what he thought, perhaps, sufficient length of time for Dick to answer. "Has t' old farmer seed ye? I reckon not, fur he allows none of your sort here."

"I have seen him," said Dick; "and he has told me that I may rest here for a short time."

"My eye, what a wonder! But who be ye?" he reiterated, with more anxiousness than before

"A stranger."

"I could 'a to'd thee that, mun!" he exclaimed, with a grin at his own sharpness. "But I think as how I knows you, though you be nationly altered."

"Know me?" ejaculated Dick, with a sudden movement.

"Yes," said the boy, nodding—"I think I'se seed you afore."

"Nonsense—nonsense! I am a stranger here."

"That may be; but I seed ye at York."

Dick bent forward curiously.

"I'm right—I'm sure I'm right!" continued the boy. "I know where I seed you—it wor at the Bowling-Green at York. You was a-playing at ninepins, and after you had gone the folks all said as how you were Dick Tarpin, and as how you had rode a 'oss—leastways, your mare, Black Bess—from London to York in one night!"

The boy evidently recognised Dick.

He spoke these words, too, in a tone of voice that sounded most dangerously loud in the ears of the weary fugitive.

He evidently failed to understand the vital necessity which existed for the use of secrecy and caution.

Dick held up his hand.

"Hush—hush!" he cried. "Come closer. You speak too loud."

But the shock-headed youth seemed to doubt the advisability of drawing any closer.

"Fear nothing," said Dick. "I only want to speak to you."

"But tell me who you are?"

"Come closer, then. I will not hurt you, and I will tell you all."

This assurance and the promise combined dispelled his dread, and, without further hesitation, he placed himself within arm's-length.

"If you will be my friend," said Dick, earnestly, "this will be the best day you have ever had. Look here—I have money in abundance. You shall have as much as you require, provided you are faithful and secret."

Dick was not deceived when he fancied he could detect the existence of a certain brightness of intellect in this lad.

He clearly comprehended all that Dick said to him, and what was stranger still, the rudeness and uncouthness he had showed at first wore off to a remarkable extent.

"Go on," he said. "I am listening."

"But will you promise to serve me?"

"Are you Dick Turpin?"

The fugitive hesitated a moment before he replied, but feeling that it would be worse than useless to give a denial, he said:

"I am."

No sooner had he uttered these words than, to his greater surprise, the boy manifested the utmost signs of joy and satisfaction.

"I thought it was, blest if I didn't!"

"Will you serve me?"

"Yes—that is——"

"What are your conditions?" interrupted Dick, quickly.

"That you tell me all about your ride to York on Black Bess—I mean every one of the particulars."

The boy's eyes glittered with excitement.

"I promise that readily," answered Dick, as soon as he had recovered himself from the surprise into which this strange request had thrown him.

"That's all right, then. Hurrah!"

"And is that all?"

"No, not all. I want something else."

"I thought so. What is it?"

"Why, money enough to buy a horse," he continued, with growing excitement.

"A horse?"

"Yes—and a suit of first-class clothes as well, a brace or two of pistols, and plenty of powder and lead."

Dick's amazement increased.

"You are an odd customer, and no mistake!" said Dick. "What on earth do you want a horse and these things for?"

"Because," was the reply, spoken with more excitement than ever in tone and gesture—"because then I should set up as highwayman myself, and perhaps ride all the way from York to London."

Dick was so surprised at this announcement that for a moment or two he was deprived of speech.

His first inclination was to break out into a hearty laugh.

Prudence, however, whispered that the best thing he could do would be to subdue this impulse; for if indulged in, it might change this boy into a foe.

Dick could not afford to lose one who, no matter with what motives, was ready and willing to be his friend.

A more unlikely figure for a highwayman was certainly never before beheld.

"You don't know what you are asking for," said Dick, at length. "If you have any serious intention of adopting such a course, take my advice and abandon it."

"Not till I've given it a good trial," was the firm rejoinder. "I have thought a good deal about it, I have, and the first time I have a chance I mean to try it on."

This determination was delivered in that particular way which makes you feel that any dissuasive arguments would be worse than useless.

"You will not betray me?" cried Dick, presently, fixing a keen glance upon him.

The boy made a gesture of impatience and disdain.

"Does the gaffer know you?"

"Who's the gaffer?"

"Why, the farmer yonder."

"He does not."

"I thought he didn't, because why: if he did, he would send for the officers pretty quick—and do you know they are close by here now!"

"Close by?" ejaculated Dick, with a start.

"Yes. I seed 'em when I fetched the cows up by old Mobbs's coppice."

Dick was as wise as ever.

"Where are they now?"

"I don't know; but I will go and see, if you like."

"Do so—do so; and yet, stay," added Dick, who could hardly feel certain that the boy would not be tempted to betray him.

"What is it, captain?"

"Do you know what a large reward there is offered to anyone who will discover me?"

"Yes, I do."

"It is very large."

"I don't care if it is. Lor' bless you, captain, I ain't such a fool as I look—oh no, not by a good many long chalks. I know them Lunnon officers before to-day."

"Indeed!"

"Yes. Suppose as how I was to tell them where you are, and be green enough to think I should get the money, what do you think would be the upshot? Why, they would stick to all the blessed lot theirselves, and tell me if I said a word they'd swear a robbery on to me, and tell me I ought to feel glad to get off. Oh, I knows 'em, I does."

"So it appears," answered Dick, who from that moment gave the boy credit for more than an ordinary share of intelligence.

"Is that all you've got to say, captain?"

"Yes."

"Then I'll go off and see if the officers are about. Don't you move till I come back."

He hurriedly departed, leaving Dick in anything but a comfortable frame of mind.

In spite of everything, the fugitive felt wretched and full of doubt.

Should the officers be at hand, what should he do—how could he hope to escape them?

The farmer if questioned would readily give every information, and it seemed as though he could not possibly avoid falling into their hands.

How rejoiced he felt when he heard the sound of the boy's returning footsteps!

"I can't see anything of them now," he said, in reply to Dick's anxious inquiring glance, "but I have heard as how they have been searching round for you, and so it's most likely they will come here before they leave off."

"I must depart," said Dick, rising with great difficulty—"I must depart. I dare not remain here any longer."

"And if you go," said the boy, "what is to save you then?"

"What is to save me if I remain?"

"I will."

"Thanks for your good will, but I fear it would be beyond your powers to accomplish it."

"You don't know what I could do."

"I certainly do not."

"I should hide you."

"And what good would that be?"

"The officers would never find you."

Dick shook his head.

"The farmer would tell them I was somewhere about the premises, and they would not leave until they had searched every corner."

"Very true," said the boy, scratching his head; "I did not think of that."

Dick came towards the front of the shed, as if about to emerge.

But his strange companion pushed him back.

"Wait a bit, captain; we must think this matter over. Ah! you may smile, but I have heard the fable about the mouse that set the lion free, and I daresay you have too."

"I certainly have," answered Dick, more and more astonished at the boy's manner.

"Very well, then. Now you will hardly think it, but I have thought of a plan to make your safety quite certain."

"You have?"

"I really have, captain."

"Let me hear it, and rest assured I shall not suffer you to be a loser by what you do for me."

"I want nothing more than I have asked you for."

"Well, well—we shall see about that. I am impatient to hear your plan."

"It's simple enough."

"So much the better."

"All you have to do is to go up to the gaffer yonder, and say how very thankful you are for his hospitality, and tell him you are going because you have particular business which won't let you stay any longer."

"Well?"

"That's just to throw him off the scent, you know. Well, when you have said that, you must walk away towards the granary yonder. Do you see it?"

"That round place covered with red tiles?"

"Yes, that's it. You will, as I said, walk towards that, as if you were going straight away as fast as you could."

"I quite understand."

"Well, then, you see the path goes straight to the granary, and then turns round it. Now, as soon as ever you turn the corner of the building so as to be out of sight of the gaffer—for he is almost sure to stand and watch you—you must stand still with your back close to the wall and wait till I come to you."

"And what else?" said Dick.

"That's enough for the present Do as I tell you. He's coming, and if he sees me speaking to you it will be all up."

So saying, the boy hastily retreated, leaving Dick in anything but a settled state of mind.

A moment's consideration made him decide that it would be best to follow the boy's instructions.

Indeed, any movement would be better than remaining where he was.

Accordingly, he emerged from the shed and walked limpingly towards the farmer, who, seeing him approach, waved him off with an impatient and angry gesture.

But Dick, who had grown wonderfully stronger, continued to advance towards him.

Pausing when a few yards from him, he took off his hat and made a bow with much of that grace for which he had once been famous.

"I am grateful," he said, in tones that were full of the deepest irony—"very grateful to you for your kind hospitality; I am rested now, and as I have business which will admit of no delay, I am anxious to depart. Good morning!"

Again he bowed, and then immediately turned on his heel.

The words must have touched him, for he called out:

"Hi—hi—stop! Don't go yet! Come in the house and have something to eat and drink."

But Dick firmly shook his head, and continued to walk as fast as his stiffened limbs would let him towards the granary.

"D—n him for a fool!" cried the farmer, angrily. "However, he can't say anything against me now. I asked him and he refused, so that is his look-out."

The farmer seemed to derive abundant satisfaction from this circumstance, and, as the boy had foretold, continued to watch Dick's receding figure until it vanished round the angle of the granary.

Beyond this point it was no longer possible to observe the path without he had quitted his position, so that he never for one moment suspected that Dick had stopped.

With another hearty curse upon beggars and their pride, he turned on his heel and marched off to superintend the agricultural operations that were being carried on.

In the meanwhile, Dick, according to the instructions he had received, stopped close against the wall.

From this point he was able to obtain a tolerably extensive view, and his first proceeding was to scan the landscape with a rapid glance.

"All is well in that quarter," he said; "there are no officers to be seen there."

He unconsciously spoke these words in a much louder tone than was prudent—at any rate, the boy overheard them.

"Not there, captain," he said, "but they're a coming across by Banks's Meer, and will be at the farm in no time."

"Are you sure of that?"

"Quite. But don't put yourself about, captain—there isn't the least occasion. If they come from Lunnon and think themselves mighty clever, they will find the north country chaps a match for them."

CHAPTER MCXX.

MR. SKELLUM MAKES A SEARCH IN THE GRANARY.

There was such a degree of confidence and assurance in the boy's manner that Dick Turpin really began in earnest to believe that his pursuers were destined to have one more defeat added to the long list of those which they had already experienced.

"This way, captain—follow me, and you will soon see what sort of a hiding-place I intend for you. Be quick, or the officers may catch a glimpse of you."

The boy held open the door of the granary, and Dick readily enough crossed the threshold, because it seemed pretty clear that if he attempted to move away from the shadow of the building he would inevitably be seen.

The interior of the granary seemed at first to be profoundly dark, but Dick's eyes growing accustomed to the gloom enabled him to perceive that his new friend was very busy with something which, on closer inspection proved to be a ladder.

This he placed against the wall in one corner, and going to a little shelf just over the door by which he had entered, produced a key.

With this in his hand he hastily ascended the ladder and thrust it into the lock of a trap-door.

"Now, captain," he said, "this door is a devil of a weight, because it is iron, you see, and I want you to help me to lift it up."

Dick also mounted the ladder, and willingly rendered the assistance required.

By their united aid the trap-door was easily raised, and when it had reached a certain height the boy propped it up with an iron rod provided for the purpose, which prevented it from falling.

"Now, captain," he said, "follow me, and the sooner the better—there is not a second to lose."

"Is this where you are going to conceal me?" asked Dick, glancing around him.

"This is the place, captain."

This upper portion of the granary was much better lighted than the lower, though here so much gloom reigned that it was not very easy to distinguish one object from another.

All that the place appeared to contain, however, was a large quantity of either wheat or oats—not contained in sacks, but spread upon the floor, which was composed of iron, and so contrived that it could be heated from below when necessary, so as to dry the grain which laid upon it.

The depth was considerable—certainly more than a yard.

"Now, look here, captain," said the boy; "you must go over to that corner yonder, and help me to make a hole in the corn—you must lay down in it, and I will cover you all over with it so that no one would be able to guess you are here. Do you understand?"

"Perfectly."

And by way of showing that he thought well of the plan, Dick hastened to the corner indicated, and set to work to scoop up the corn.

A sufficiently large hole was made in a very little time indeed, and then, by the boy's directions, Dick laid down.

"Cover your face with your cap, captain—that's it! Now you will be comfortable. I will throw the corn on very light, and you will be able to breathe without any trouble."

With this wise suggestion Dick at once complied.

With great speed his new friend set about completing his task, which he did with great skill; and no one to have looked at the surface of the corn on the granary floor would guess that it had been disturbed, let alone anyone hid under it.

"Now, captain," were his parting words, "don't on any account think of moving until I come back again, which you may depend I shall be sure to do as soon as ever it is safe for me to do so."

"All right!" said Dick, though his voice sounded so muffled and hollow that it fairly made the boy jump—"all right! Can you close the trap?"

"Oh, yes! And now don't say a word!

Dick was silent, and awaited the result with no small amount of anxiety.

The boy with great agility got down on to the ladder, lowered the trap-door—which was a much easier thing to do than to raise it—and having carefully locked it, placed the key in its accustomed place on the shelf over the door.

Listening for a moment, and finding all silent, he slipped out unobserved and hastened to his work.

There was a bright, twinkling glitter in his eyes as he shuffled along, whistling a popular air the while with a gusto that sufficiently indicated the extent of his satisfaction.

Dick lay and listened, but in vain.

Not the least sound was borne to his ears, which was no doubt in part owing to his being covered over in the manner we have described.

What seemed to him to be an endless length of time gradually passed away without anything arising that would lead to the belief that the police officers were within a hundred miles of the place.

Suddenly, however, the murmur of voices arose, which soon swelled into a loud chorus, but Dick could not distinguish any of the words that were uttered.

Then a door creaked open, and immediately afterwards Dick recognised the farmer's voice.

"But don't I tell you he's gone!" he exclaimed, in tones that showed he was in a state of great irritation. "I saw him go myself, with my own eyes; and while you are poking about my barns he is getting comfortably out of the way."

"And I tell you he hasn't gone!" was the reply. "If he had left the premises I must have seen him, or at least, some of my men, but we have not. No doubt he would catch sight of us coming, and make up his mind to hide."

It was Skellum who spoke.

Dick had no difficulty in identifying him.

"Never tell me!" responded the farmer, impatiently. "Where on earth could he hide, I should like to know?"

"I shall be able to answer that question best when I have had a good look round."

"Oh, very well—very well!"

"What place do you call this?"

"The granary."

"The granary, eh!" said Skellum, suspiciously. "It's devilish dark. Let's have a light."

"Be careful," remonstrated the farmer—"a spark would serve to set this place on fire, and then I should be a ruined man."

"Do you presume to obstruct his Majesty's officers in the execution of their duty?" asked Skellum, fiercely.

"No—no. Only I——"

"Very well, then, hold your row! Smithers, hand me a light."

Skellum took a lantern from one of his subordinates, and flashed the light of it well around him.

"There's nobody here, anyway. But what's above?"

"The drying-room."

"We'll just have a look at it, if merely for satisfaction's sake. How do you get up?"

"You may well ask that. A wilful man, though, will have his own way; but I am a Dutchman if you ain't losing precious minutes."

"That does not matter to you, does it?" retorted Skellum. "Do you know I have a good mind to take you into custody on suspicion of your having concealed Dick Turpin somewhere, or assisted him to escape!"

"Oh, pooh—pooh!"

"You may pooh-pooh as much as you like; but I've a d—d good mind to do it, now then! Your conduct is quite enough to justify me."

"Don't be absurd."

"Well, well, think yourself lucky if you get off without hearing anything more of this affair. Now tell me how we are to get up into the drying-room."

Skellum's persistence in this matter might well have seemed strange, for there was now no visible means of communication with the upper floor of the granary, the boy having had the prudence to restore the ladder to the latter place.

But, to tell the truth, Skellum was not more certain of anything in all his life than he was that Dick must be hidden somewhere among the farm buildings.

The farmer had acknowledged to having seen him only about a quarter of an hour ago, and Skellum was absolutely certain that no living creature could have crossed the open fields surrounding the homestead without their knowledge.

Having this conviction, he had resolved not to allow any nook or corner, no matter how unlikely it might appear, to pass unexamined.

In appearance a more unlikely place for Dick to be concealed in was that which Skellum was so resolved to pry into.

He saw the ladder fetched out and placed against the wall, and after that the key taken off the shelf over the entrance door.

"If he is up there," Skellum muttered, as he heard the key grate harshly in the rusty wards, "he must either have an accomplice about the farm—which I don't for a moment believe—or else he has gained an entrance by some other means, which is quite possible."

Having come to this conclusion, he followed the farmer up the ladder, and by their joint exertions the heavy trap-door was raised and fixed open.

The crisis had now arrived.

Dick would either escape entirely or be found at once.

When he heard that the farmer was one of the exploring party his uneasiness was great.

He considered, and with good reason, that his eyes would be much more likely to detect any little misplacement of the grain than the police officers', who had never been in the place before.

"This place seems quiet enough," said Skellum, looking around and failing to discern the least thing that was suspicious, for the boy had taken care to leave the grain perfectly smooth and level. "The only thing that I should like to feel certain of is, whether there is any other way in and out than that."

He pointed to the trap door.

"If I told you there wasn't I don't suppose you would take my word," answered the farmer, testily; "and I don't suppose you will feel satisfied until you have passed all this corn through a sieve to make sure he is not in it."

"I should be inclined to take that trouble if I could discern the least sign of its having been disturbed," answered Skellum, deliberately. "It would serve to hide fifty men."

He drew his sword as he spoke, and thrust it several times into the corn round about where he stood; but as that happened to be nowhere near the spot where Dick lay, it was, of course, without success.

"You are sure there is no other way by which admittance can be gained to this place?"

"I will give you my word of it; and if you really want to capture the fellow set out in pursuit of him. Your own common sense ought to tell you that I should not encourage such a vagabond about the place; if I did I should expect to be robbed for my pains, and serve me right too," he added.

"It would," replied Skellum. "Give me your hand. I meant no harm; only if you had the least idea what this fellow has caused me to go through lately, you would wonder at my being in my seven senses at all."

"Very likely," said the farmer. "I don't bear malice, and only hope you may catch him. It is quite certain that he can't be far away, for when I saw him he seemed to be so weak that he could hardly crawl."

"We are bound to have him," said Skellum, who was inspired with fresh hope by these words. "Come on—come on!"

In rather a tumultuous manner the whole of the party now quitted the drying-room.

The trap-door was lowered, the steps removed, and Dick might be said to have added one more to the long list of his hair-breadth escapes.

With keenly-sensitive ears, he listened to the departure of his foes, and when, at length, he heard them close the granary door behind them such a sensation of deep joyfulness came over him as cannot be expressed.

Soon he was left in absolute silence.

The position he was in was a most irksome one, yet he was afraid to ease himself by making the least movement, lest his enemies should return and detect the disarrangement of the grain.

Forced to be still, he endeavoured to reconcile himself as best he could.

The silence, the stillness he was obliged to maintain, and perhaps, too, the confined space he had to breathe in, added to his excessive weakness and fatigue, insensibly drew him into a slumber, which rendered him for a while happily oblivious of all his troubles.

How long this slumber lasted he had no means of judging; but suddenly he awoke without knowing whether anything had occurred to awaken him or not.

He was in doubt, too, where he was, the intense darkness and stillness making him think that he must be in the gipsy's caravan.

But a slight tapping reached his ears, and then, with a ash, the remembrance of what had occurred came back to him.

Before he could control himself sufficiently to have entire command over his actions, he started up.

No sooner had he done so than he became fully sensible of the imprudent nature of the step.

It was now taken, and could not be recalled.

With fast-beating heart, he listened.

The tapping came again.

"Captain—captain!" he heard some one cry, in a muffled voice, which seemed at least to be miles and miles away.

Dick clasped his hands over his temples, for his brain was not quite clear yet.

Then the tapping was renewed.

This time it was louder than before.

Immediately after, a voice much nearer and clearer said:

"Captain—captain! Where are you? Come and help me—I can't lift the trap-door by myself."

The last words were more than sufficient to dispel any lingering doubts.

"All right!" he answered. "I hear you now—I am coming."

And now Dick's practised hearing did him good service.

Dark as it was, yet he was able to make his way without hesitation to the trap-door.

"How can I help you?" he asked, groping busily the while with both his hands upon the floor.

"You will find a ring," answered his friend. "Put out all your strength, and between us we shall manage it."

Dick soon found the iron ring the boy had mentioned.

By their united exertions the ponderous trap-door was raised.

"Have they gone?" was Dick's first eager question as he caught sight of the boy.

"Yes—long ago. It's all right. Why didn't you answer me when I called you first? You have kept me here knocking for ten minutes at least."

"I was asleep."

"Asleep? Well, that's what I call a good 'un—blest if it isn't! The idea, now, that you should go off to sleep, and the officers poking and prying after you everywhere!"

"It was more like a swoon than slumber," answered Dick; "but I fancy it must have been the latter, I feel so wonderfully refreshed."

"Glad to hear it, captain—you will require to make use of all your energies."

"What has happened?"

"Oh, it's all right enough now! Gaffer and the officers have got first-rate friends. I thought once they would have had a round or two, but now it's all right."

"How all right?"

"Why, they have searched everywhere, and failed to find the least trace of you; and if the gaffer wasn't so very positive, they would not believe you had been here at all. As it is, they vow and maintain that he must have been mistaken in the length of time that elapsed after you left him."

"Oh, that is it! And how has it ended?"

"Why, being compelled to rest, they have accepted the gaffer's invitation. Their horses are all standing in the stable, and they are sitting in the big kitchen, feasting like so many hungry wolves."

"Some of them are outside, watching, I suppose?"

"No, not one."

"Then I must go, for such a favourable state of things may not continue long."

"Now, captain, just be easy, will you? Look here! I have brought you something good in the shape of eating and drinking. Take it, and sit still a bit."

These words reminded Dick that a meal of any kind would be a most acceptable thing; so, without hesitation, he very gladly accepted the provisions which the boy had so thoughtfully provided for him.

It was most important that he should recover his strength as soon as possible.

"And now, captain, take my word for it, you are quite safe where you are—that is, for the present. I should not recommend you to stay all night."

"I cannot. It is most important I should leave at once."

"So you shall, never fear; but you must not fail to keep your word."

"What do you mean?"

"To relate the particulars of your ride to York."

Dick could not refuse compliance with this favour, and so, without any demur, he began, and related with tolerable minuteness all those incidents which have already been placed before the reader.

Never did narrator have a more attentive listener.

Every word was greedily swallowed by his ears; and when Dick brought his narration to a conclusion, he drew a long breath and said:

"Ah, captain, I wish I had got to have it all over again!"

"I would gratify you if it laid at all within my power, but I have most particular business on hand. Tell me—how far am I from York city?"

"Maybe three-parts of a mile."

"No more?"

"Certainly no more—rather less, if anything."

This was welcome news indeed.

Dick drew from his pocket a quantity of valuables.

"Here, my lad," he said, "take these in return for the service you have done me. If I had ten times as much, you would be equally welcome to it."

"No, no, captain—I want no more than I asked you for, nor I won't have more either, so take it back."

"Wait a moment! I shall not take it back; and if you have any serious thoughts of taking to the road, let me earnestly implore you to abandon the idea."

"I can't do it—it has been my dream day and night for—oh, I can't tell how long."

"No matter," said Dick, with a tinge of bitterness and regret in his tones. "Look at me! You see what I am now—a poor, miserable, hunted wretch, with not half my stock of life left in my body, surrounded by dangers which I can scarcely hope to evade much longer, deprived of every comfort and enjoyment, short of everything—as peace, home, friends—that can make existence pleasant. This it is to be a highwayman."

These words produced an effect, and Dick, perceiving it, hastened to follow up with all the dissuasive arguments he could call up.

His trouble was not thrown away.

"You have conquered, captain," said the boy, at length, though the sigh which accompanied the words testified the amount of disappointment he experienced. "I didn't consider the matter properly."

"You did not. But you see now what to look forward to. I have been famous, celebrated, successful; and yet, what am I now? Do you think, if I could have seen the end, that I should have embraced such a career?"

"And shall you give it up?"

"For ever. My sole object now is to get away from England, and when I succeed, no more will be heard of Dick Turpin, the highwayman."

An impressive silence followed these words.

The boy hardly knew how to break it, and besides, he had not altogether recovered himself from this rude awakening from his cherished day-dream.

As for Dick, sad, regretful reminiscences deprived him of speech.

With a sudden effort he aroused himself, and having insisted upon the boy receiving the valuables he had drawn out of his pocket, he said:

"Now show me the way out of this place. Finish up the priceless service you have rendered me to-day by putting me on the nearest road to York."

"I will go with you, captain, if you like."

"Many thanks, but for your own sake you had better not. Should we chance to be seen together, the consequences would be most serious to you."

"Never mind me."

"But I do mind you, and will not allow you to make any further sacrifice. Be quick—lead the way!"

No longer attempting to carry his point, the boy obeyed.

The granary was carefully restored to its usual state, so as to leave nothing as a clue to what had taken place, and in a few minutes afterwards Dick once more found himself standing in the open air.

The night was a very dark one, and this, for Dick, was a most fortunate circumstance, though it made the task of keeping the proper road a more difficult one.

[DICK TURPIN SHOOTS THE GAME COCK.]

Suddenly a loud burst of unruly laughter was carried to their ears.

"The officers are enjoying themselves above a bit, ain't they, captain?"

"It appears so. They are close at hand, are they not?"

"Yes. Look—you see yonder light?"

"Is that the room they are in?"

"Yes. They are making merry now."

"I shall defeat them," said Dick, with something like a return of that energy which had been his characteristic in times of old. "Something seems now to whisper to my heart and say I shall defeat them."

"Of course you will, captain; I have no doubt of it."

The sound of his companion's voice brought him back to a closer consideration of time present.

"York," he cried—"where lies York?"

"Straight before us. Follow me a little way, and I will show it to you."

Dick willingly complied.

A few steps took them clear of all the farm buildings, and pausing on a little knoll, the boy extended his arm, and said:

"There is York."

Dick looked eagerly in the direction thus pointed out.

A few dim and twinkling lights could just be distinguished in the far distance.

"Many thanks!" he said. "I could find my way unerringly with a less guide than that. Farewell! We shall not meet again; but rest assured that Dick Turpin will always think of you with the deepest gratitude. Follow my advice—let nothing induce you to return to your former project. Once more, farewell!"

CHAPTER MCXXI.

THE LAWYER'S CLERK LEARNS MORE THAN IS GOOD FOR HIM TO KNOW.

Dick Turpin turned upon his heel and strode away with as much swiftness as his strength would permit.

The boy looked after him for a few moments in surprise.

Then he took a few paces forward, as though he had made up his mind to follow.

But he soon checked himself, for he remembered what Dick had said.

"I will stop here and watch him, though," he muttered. "He didn't say a word agen that, did he?"

And with a dogged air, he fixed himself in one position, and remained without moving long after Dick's dusky form had disappeared.

As for the fugitive himself, he could not banish his friend's image from his mind.

The effect which his fidelity had produced upon him was marked indeed.

Only those who have been cut off from all friendly intercourse with their fellow-creatures can truly estimate Dick's feelings on this occasion.

There was a warm glow about his heart, and more than once he felt inclined to call him to his side.

But the recollection of the important business he had under hand would make him change his determination and increase his speed.

Although dark, the hour was by no means late, and as the City of York was such a short distance off, he had every hope of being able to complete his business with the lawyers without delay.

As he strode along, he strove to concentrate his thoughts upon the matter in hand, so that he should be able to give a clear and connected narrative when the time came.

It so chanced that Dick did not catch sight of a single person until after he had entered the city.

He now regretted that he had not made some inquiries of the boy about the address of the solicitors.

Doubtless he would have given him such directions as would have enabled him to find out their abode without much trouble.

Upon finding himself in the streets of the ancient city, he had no other guide than chance.

He walked on at random.

The quarter in which he found himself seemed by no means to be the most respectable; but Dick did not care for that.

Upon turning a corner, his ears were assailed by some strains of music—if the vigorous scraping of a fiddle can be so called.

Directly afterwards, he discovered that the sounds proceeded from a kind of public-house, in the front window of which a rude oil lamp was burning.

Here Dick paused and took a peep into the interior, which he was easily able to do, for a large red curtain, by which the gazing of intruders could have been prevented, was only partially drawn across the casement.

He beheld a group of rough-looking individuals of both sexes dancing vigorously to the fiddle.

"If I could only get a little brandy," thought Dick—"only a very little, I feel as though it would be putting fresh life into me. Shall I run the risk of entering? I think I will. There could not be a better place than this; everybody's attention seems to be engaged."

He hesitated for another moment, and then, turning suddenly, he crossed the threshold.

He procured the stimulant he needed without any difficulty, and might have left the place unnoticed had he not shown himself to be a stranger by asking to be directed to the solicitors.

"Flint and Steel?" said the woman who had served him, and who now bent upon him a keen, inquiring look. "Is it possible that you are such a stranger here as not to know that?"

"You might guess it," he answered, quietly, "or I should not have troubled you. Good night."

"Nay—stop! Do you know the Minster front?"

"Of course."

"Then you know Flint and Steel's, for the house is just opposite."

Upon learning this, Dick retreated hastily, scarcely pausing to bid the woman good night.

"I must not stay long in York," he muttered. "Fortunately, there is nothing to detain me."

The streets were all very quiet.

Just then, the chiming of a clock somewhere close at hand struck upon his ear.

He listened, and counted the strokes carefully.

"Eight o'clock," he murmured, as the last of the musical sounds died away. "The night is younger than I thought by one hour at least, and if I am not nearer the Minster than I believed myself to be, it is very strange."

Dick was right.

He was indeed very close to York Minster, for upon gaining the next corner he found himself in full view of the grand old edifice, which looked doubly magnificent in the obscurity which hung about it.

With a quicker and firmer step—for the brandy was beginning to exert its influence—Dick walked in the wished-for direction.

A very few moments afterwards, and he was standing before the principal front of the building.

How to find out precisely which was the residence of the solicitors was not so easy as he had fancied, for there was a row of twenty houses before him, any one of which might have been considered opposite.

"Chance must guide me," he said. "It will not do to linger, or to inquire again. I will try the middle house."

He did so.

He pulled a bell-handle vigorously; and after waiting for a considerable time, a woman carrying a candle made her appearance.

"Next door!" she said, harshly, in answer to Dick's question, and then abruptly retired.

"I am fortunate, I suppose," he murmured, as he stood before the next house.

His eyes were tolerably well accustomed to the darkness by this time, and he was just able to make out that there was a large brass plate on this door, though he could not distinguish the letters upon it.

This time his summons for admittance was promptly attended to.

A thin, loose-jointed young man, with tow-coloured hair, opened the door, and, in a disagreeable voice, inquired Dick's business.

"I want to see Mr. Flint."

"Not at home!" was the snappish answer.

"Mr. Steel, then."

"Engaged!"

"I will wait, then," replied Dick; and as he spoke the words he crossed the threshold, thus frustrating the young man in his design of slamming the door in his face.

"But don't you know, fellow, that business hours are over?"

"I am quite aware of it; but I come upon a private and important matter that will brook not a moment's delay."

"What is it?"

"That I decline to tell anyone but Mr. Steel."

"Then you will have to come to-morrow, for he is engaged the whole of to-night."

"I cannot come to-morrow," responded Dick. "I am in no hurry, and will wait here until he is at leisure."

Just at that moment a door a little way along the passage was opened, and an elderly man, who wore a large white wig, made his appearance.

He carried a wax candle in one hand, which he held high up above his head.

Then bowing very profoundly, he said:

"Excuse the darkness of my dwelling, your worship. I heartily wish that I dwelt in a place more fit for you to visit."

"Pooh—stuff! None of that gammon, Steel—you know d—d well I don't like it!"

Dick started when he heard this last voice.

"Sir Humphrey," he ejaculated—"and here! What could be more fortunate?"

It was indeed the worthy baronet who now emerged from the lawyer's apartment.

Dick hastened towards him.

"Sir Humphrey," he cried, in an earnest voice, "you know me. Don't speak now—ask the lawyer to go back into the room with us; I have something of the most vital interest to communicate to you."

The baronet's face became in a moment the very picture of extreme amazement.

"You here?" he exclaimed at length. "Why, what the devil——"

"Hush—hush!" interrupted Dick, for he saw that the singular-looking young man who had opened the door stood gazing in open-mouthed astonishment upon the scene. "Not another word, I beg! Let me entreat you to accede to my request!"

"Who is this?" asked Mr. Steel, who had been not a little startled by the suddenness with which Dick had made his appearance.

"Why, it's——"

"You shall know in another moment," cried Dick, in a much louder voice, thus completely drowning what the baronet said. "But I have called to-night because I have a communication of the utmost importance to make to you."

"Come in, then—come in. Shut the door, Rogers. What the devil are you standing there with it open for?"

These last words were addressed to the loose-jointed young man, and who was one of the articled clerks.

So absorbed were all his faculties by what was taking place, that he was quite oblivious of the fact that he had omitted to close the front door until thus reminded of it.

By the time he had turned round and done this the little party had entered the room.

Mr. Steel went in last, and he carefully shut the door behind him.

But Rogers, the clerk, was either of an inquiring tone of mind, or else especially interested in what was taking place in the lawyer's sanctum, for he dropped down on his knees on the mat and applied his ear closely to the key-hole.

Leaving him to pick up what he can in this manner, we will make the reader acquainted with what actually took place.

When the door was closed, Mr. Steel looked first at one and then at the other, wondering which would speak first.

He was soon relieved on this head, for Dick was fully conscious that he had not a moment to lose.

Addressing himself to the baronet, he said:

"You, sir, know me, and I fancy will give me a better character than most people. Since, by your kind aid, I succeeded in making my escape, I have had many strange adventures; but the most important is that I chanced to overhear the details of a deep-laid plot, which an unworthy villain has planned against your happiness and your daughter's."

If what Dick had said at first was not sufficient to arrest the attention of Sir Humphrey, this mention of his daughter was more than enough for the purpose.

A change instantly came over his face, and in a voice and manner entirely different from what he generally employed, he cried:

"Speak out quickly—do not keep me in suspense!"

"Nothing is further from my desire."

Dick then, without one word of preface, related what he had overheard while in the gipsy's caravan.

Before he had spoken many words, Mr. Steel became deeply interested, and, taking out a pocket-book, occupied himself by scribbling down copious notes.

Dick had reflected upon what he had to say, and had beforehand called up everything in his mind, so that he was able to repeat the conversation almost word for word.

The baronet drew a long breath as soon as the narrative was concluded.

Then, recovering himself, he said, with great fervour and heartiness:

"D—n the sneaking rascal! Milly was right in reading his character. If I had him here I'd——"

"Hush—hush!" interrupted Mr. Steel, blandly. "No violence, your worship—no violence!"

"Violence be d—d! Am I to learn all this, and not have a word to say for myself about it? No! I could rather be——"

"Pardon me—pray pardon me; but what we have just heard is most important. Important!—why, the word seems a thousand times too weak to express it. This is what I call providential—truly providential. Of course," he added, turning to Dick, "you will come forward at the time appointed, and take your oath that all these particulars are correct? And then there will be about the clearest case of conspiracy that was ever laid before a court of justice. But, what the devil do you keep shaking your head in that fashion for?"

"Because," said Dick, speaking very slowly and solemnly—"because I cannot come forward in the way you mention. I have every desire to do so, but circumstances render it impossible."

The solicitor regarded him with an air of blank amazement.

"Why—why?" he asked.

"Sir Humphrey will tell you."

"Nay—tell him yourself."

"Then, Mr. Steel, I have a still greater secret to confide in you—a still more astounding revelation to make."

"What is it?"

"You have heard, I suppose, of one Dick Turpin?"

"Yes."

"The highwayman?"

"Yes. What of him?"

"Nothing more than that he now stands in person before you."

It would be perfectly useless to attempt to convey any idea of the effect which this altogether unexpected announcement had upon the lawyer.

To use a mild term, his astonishment would have lasted much longer than it did, had not Sir Humphrey exerted himself to put an end to it.

"Don't be so dumbfoundered, man! It's all true—every word of it. Never mind about his being a highwayman—that has got nothing to do with the matter in hand. He is a downright good fellow, and I would take his word at any time for a thousand pounds."

On any other occasion Mr. Steel would have been staggered by hearing the baronet speak in this manner, for, of course, he was well acquainted with his sentiments regarding poachers and such-like.

But his former surprise quite overpowered this, and he did not even make a remark.

"I need not say any more to convince you that I cannot do as you have said," exclaimed Dick. "But if you will take down what I have said, I am ready to sign it in your presence. More I cannot do; and I must leave it to your skill as a lawyer to make the best use possible of the information I have given you."

Mr. Steel inclined his head, and Dick continued:

"But this is not all: I will also sign another document that will prove that the half-brother of the late Marquis of Belgarde will never claim the estates, and consequently Sir Humphrey's daughter will succeed to the whole of the property."

"Indeed!" said Mr. Steel, with additional wonderment. "Is it possible you can do this?"

"You shall judge. The half-brother I have mentioned has been for years my closest and most intimate friend. I would have sacrificed my life a thousand times over to have saved him from harm, and yet, by an accursed chance, it was my hand which deprived him of life."

"Your hand?"

"Yes. It was by the purest accident, though it will never cease to prey upon me with heart-corroding remorse. And yet, if he had been put to his choice, poor fellow, he would have infinitely preferred dying by my hand to falling into the power of his foes and ending his days at Tyburn."

"Of whom are you speaking?" asked the bewildered lawyer.

"Of my best friend—of the truest, noblest fellow that ever breathed—of one who has of late been known as Tom King, the highwayman."

"Tom King?" ejaculated the baronet and Mr. Steel in chorus.

"Yes, or I should say of the Marquis of Belgarde; and to prove to you that he was no other, I will relate you his life as he related it to me. It was under a solemn pledge of secrecy; but had he the power, he would not blame me for breaking the trust if he knew that it was to prevent the perpetration of a fraud, and to assist Sir Humphrey's daughter to obtain possession of her own."

Dick then told the whole history of Tom King, not omitting one particular.

The climax of Mr. Steel's amazement was now reached.

He was intimately acquainted with all the details of the affair, and found that what Dick said exactly tallied throughout.

"And you will sign a declaration of all this?"

"Most willingly. I rejoice to think I have the power of making this atonement—for so I consider it—for the evil I have done; and my only regret is that I cannot do more."

"Don't let that be a regret, then," said the lawyer. "You have done more than enough already. I have been in practice now a great many years, and consequently have had a tolerable insight into life; but this is altogether unparalleled—absolutely unparalleled."

"I should rather think so!" exclaimed the baronet.

"There is only one thing," added Dick, "and that is, that the declarations must be signed now. My enemies are close at hand, and searching in every direction for me. I shall have to take the greatest precaution to elude them. To return here again would be wholly out of the question—to stay very long would be dangerous to a degree."

"You think they will track you, then?"

"I do."

"Then not a moment shall be lost. And if I can do anything for you, depend upon it I will."

"Many thanks."

"I will set about the declarations now."

He touched a bell as he spoke.

The tinkling sound was the first intimation Dick received of what had taken place.

Had he been aware in time, he would most likely have urged some objections to the adoption of such a course.

Now, however, it was too late to interfere.

A profound silence followed.

At least a moment elapsed, and then Mr. Steel exclaimed:

"Where the devil has Rogers gone to that he does not answer the bell?"

And again he repeated the summons, this time ringing with all the violence he was capable of.

But no better result followed.

Dick's suspicions, ever on the alert, were now thoroughly and completely roused.

"We must find out where Mr. Rogers is without further delay," he said, in very significant tones.

He crossed the room with a rapid step as he pronounced the words, and opened the door quietly.

He peeped out first; but the entrance-hall of the lawyer's house was deserted.

Not a sign of a human being could be seen.

Dick emerged.

The first thing which attracted his attention was that the front door was ajar.

Hastening to it, he peeped out; but seeing nothing of a suspicious nature, he quickly closed it again.

The lawyer looked at him inquiringly.

"What do you make of all this? What are you going to do?"

"What has taken place is clear enough," was the calm response. "Your clerk—whom I distrusted the moment I saw him—has managed to hear enough of our conversation to know who I am. Having learned this, he has set off to fetch the officers; doubtless they will be here in a few moments."

"And can you stand there like that and talk quietly about such an event?" cried the lawyer, aghast. "I am past being surprised to-night, or I should be astounded now."

Dick smiled.

"All will be well," he said—"take my word for it. First of all, let us proceed to business, for time is precious. Believe me," he added, with a smile, "there is not a moment to be lost."

"Well, you are certainly the most extraordinary—— But there, such words as those do waste time. What do you want me to do?"

"Why, to put my communication into as few words as you possibly can, and then I will sign and attest it."

"But you are running too much risk by remaining here like this. If you really think that the clerk has gone out for the purpose of fetching the police officers, you ought not to hesitate a moment, but be off at once."

It was Sir Humphrey Yeomans who spoke.

"Leave that to me," answered Dick, with a coolness seemed to his two auditors to be nothing short of madness. "Go on with the writing. As for you, Sir Humphrey," he added, "you ought to understand by this time that I am not the worst hand in the world at eluding police officers."

"That's true enough, I admit; and how on earth you could have managed to get here while the officers are keeping such a sharp look-out in every quarter, passes my comprehension."

Dick made no other reply to this speech than a smile, for he could perceive that their voices confused the lawyer a little, who was desirous of being as brief as possible, and yet most anxious not to omit any circumstance of importance.

For a time, then, there was absolute silence, broken only by the chirping of the lawyer's quill pen as it hurried over the paper.

Dick, in the meanwhile, was listening intently; but without suffering any sign to appear that he was doing so.

Unknown to either the baronet or the lawyer, he had, at the moment when he closed the front door, not only turned the key in the lock, but also slipped a bolt into its socket.

Having done this, he was quite sure the clerk would not be able to enter either suddenly or noiselessly.

There was a little anxiety perceptible in the glance which he bent upon the lawyer, who was still writing away as if for a wager.

Sir Humphrey seemed plunged into a deep fit of meditation.

Dick was standing close to the door of the lawyer's sanctum.

As this was open he commanded a good view of a portion of the entrance-hall and the front door.

Presently the sound of a stealthy footstep outside came upon his ear.

It stopped upon the threshold.

Then an effort was quietly made to push the door open; but being fastened, of course it was a failure.

The whispering of several voices followed.

Dick turned his eyes towards the baronet and Mr. Steel.

Neither appeared aware of what had taken place so far.

Sir Humphrey looked to be in a profounder meditation than ever.

The lawyer's pen was going at a wonderful rate; but as his face was bent down towards the table, Dick could not note its expression.

The conversation outside was not of very long continuance.

It was terminated by some one raising the ponderous knocker on the door, and banging it down once with great violence.

The sound echoed and re-echoed through the house.

Sir Humphrey started up, looking as scared as if he had been shot.

Mr. Steel dropped his pen, which, in return, discharged a large blot of ink on the white paper.

"God bless me!" he ejaculated. "What's that?"

"Don't be alarmed," returned Dick, with unruffled composure. "It's only Rogers come back."

"Only Rogers! Well, that's a good one, certainly! But come, I have just finished—sign your name."

Dick very readily obeyed this injunction, and wrote his name in full in a tolerably legible hand.

"There," he said, as he threw down the pen, "my mind is lightened of a heavy load. I feel little doubt that what I have written will defeat the machinations of a villain; and my sincere trust is that it will suffice to secure to Sir Humphrey's daughter that which is lawfully her right. Should this be accomplished I shall feel that I have done something towards requiting the priceless service she so generously and freely accorded me."

Dab came the knock at the front door again.

This time it seemed like a full stop to Turpin's speech.

CHAPTER MCXXII.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN RESOLVES TO SET ASIDE HIS VOW.

"WHAT's to be done?" asked Mr. Steel, a little nervously, for the thought just then occurred to him that it would not be much to his advantage if he was found harbouring and concealing Dick Turpin in his house.

Dick was about to speak, but Sir Humphrey interrupted him.

"Do?" he cried. "Why, I will soon tell you what we must do. By hook or by crook, somehow, we must save this brave fellow. It would be the very height of baseness to allow him to fall into the hands of his enemies."

The lawyer licked his lips, and glared around him in a nervous, despairing way.

"I don't see what is to be done."

"Then I'll tell you," exclaimed Sir Humphrey, quickly. "I have been thinking it over. Lock him up in your big safe yonder, and when the officers come in say that he left some time ago."

"No—no," said Dick. "Many thanks to you, Sir Humphrey, for manifesting so much interest in my safety; but I cannot consent to this. Should suspicion be directed towards my hiding-place, and the door consequently opened, I should have no chance of escape. Besides, both of you would be seriously compromised as well, which is the consideration which weighs most with me. No—no. What I want is to get out of the house with all speed possible. Put me in the way of doing that, and I shall be satisfied—more than satisfied."

Dab—dab!

Those outside were growing impatient, for the bell was pulled violently.

"Now," said Dick, "I dare not stay another second. How can I best leave?"

But the lawyer's wits had either deserted him, or else he had some motive for withholding a reply to Dick's question.

The latter now begun to show signs of uneasiness, as well he might.

"Hark!" he said. "Answer me one question. Is there a trap-door at the top of your house?"

"No."

Dick made a gesture of despair.

"But the attic window opens upon the tiles."

"Enough," said Dick. "Farewell! Do not keep the officers any longer. When they enter, try and induce them to depart."

Dick did not stop to say another word.

In point of fact, he had stayed much too long already.

With a rapid bound he gained the passage, and dashed up the staircase.

The knocking now was both loud and incessant.

On gaining the first floor, Dick found himself involved in darkness, but by retaining his grasp upon the balusters he was able to continue his ascent without much extra difficulty or delay.

Finding himself at the top, he groped about until he found a door.

Where it led he knew not; but he adopted the course most calculated to remove his ignorance on this point, for he lifted the latch without a second's hesitation.

A scream instantly ensued; but Dick, nevertheless, crossed the threshold, closed the door after him, and bolted it.

"Hush!" he said. "Make no sound—you have nothing to fear."

But finding this mild remonstrance had not the effect of silencing the female, he had recourse to threats.

"Another sound like that," he exclaimed, in a furious voice, "and it will be your last! Your head shall be severed from your body at one blow!"

This produced perfect stillness.

The bed-room was very dark, but yet not so profoundly so as to prevent Dick from ascertaining the position of the window, though it was covered with a curtain.

He grasped this, and not stopping to draw it to one side, gave it a sudden snatch, which brought down the whole of it upon him, well-nigh smothering him with dust.

But the next moment he had the little lattice window open, and was crouching down on all-fours on the tiles.

The roof of the lawyer's house was tremendously steep, but it was protected by a very low parapet.

This was not very far below Dick, and he cautiously suffered himself to slip down until his feet rested against it.

Then, carefully raising himself, he peeped over in order to ascertain whether he was at the front or the back of the house.

He fancied the former, and found that he was not mistaken.

He had drawn back at first, fancying that the police officers below might see him.

But, upon more careful scrutiny, he discovered that not one of them could be seen.

This was more than Dick had hoped for.

He now looked round him with an anxious glance in the hope of finding some means of descending safely and speedily to the earth.

Before he had time to decide, he was startled by a flash of light and the sound of contentious voices.

Looking behind him, he found that both proceeded from the attic he had just left.

"Curses on her squalling!" he muttered, angrily. "It must have had the effect of bringing the officers at once upon my track."

There could be little doubt about the correctness of this supposition.

She must have told them, too, by what means he had left the chamber, for the window was dashed open with great violence.

Then Dick, finding himself hard pressed, performed a feat which few indeed would have ventured to attempt.

The pieces of smooth stone with which the top of the parapet was coped were certainly less than a foot in width.

Nevertheless, Dick stepped confidently on to this narrow path, and ran with great swiftness to the further extreme of the row of houses.

The officers at the window were so amazed at the performance of this feat that they forgot to move.

Indeed, they expected every moment to see the fugitive fall headlong down.

And one false step, one moment's giddiness, and nothing could have saved Dick from being dashed to pieces on the stones in the street below him.

But upon gaining the end of the parapet he paused.

The moment they saw him still, the officers recovered their motion, and with more haste than was consistent with either prudence or safety, scrambled through the attic window.

Before they had all emerged, however, there arose a general cry of horror.

They had witnessed Dick standing at the end of the parapet, when suddenly, to their intense alarm, they saw him plunge over and disappear.

"He is down!" they cried, with a simultaneous yell—"he has fallen!"

For a second they were so paralysed by the unexpectedness of this event that they knew not what to do.

Then, recovering themselves, they hurried in a straggling line along the gutter, being impelled to ascertain the worst at once.

The corner was reached, but it took them four times as long at the very least to do it as Dick occupied.

Shuddering in anticipation of the awful sight which would be presented to them in the street below, they peeped over the abyss.

They looked down.

The ground was not very clearly discernible, it is true; yet they were certain they should be able to see so large an object as a man on the flagstones.

But there was nothing—positively nothing.

They stared at each other aghast.

"Where is he?" was the general question.

No one could reply.

Had they not all witnessed the same thing, they might have been in doubt as to what had occurred.

But there was no fear of this.

All had seen him plainly.

Where was he?

To have reached the ground unhurt after leaping from so great a height and afterwards to have run away was so incredible as not to be worth a moment's thought.

No less impossible did it seem for him to have leaped to the next pile of building, which was the width of a wide street distant—some thirty feet at least.

Had he dissolved himself into air, his vanishment could not have been more complete.

Amazement now gave place to consternation, which was so great that the officers could do nothing but gaze blankly at each other for some moments.

Recovering, they searched about in the hope of finding out something or other—they knew not what—by means of which the descent had been accomplished.

But there was nothing save the almost smooth brick walls.

Compelled at last to confess themselves entirely beaten, they turned away with the intention of making their way down into the street, vaguely hoping that they might find something here which would put them in the way of clearing up this great mystery.

But they took the precaution of leaving one of their number on the housetop.

Although they lost not a moment, yet, as a matter of course, they were some time before they reached the right spot, which they had no difficulty in finding.

Here, however, they failed to find anything that held out the faintest promise of giving them a clue.

"We have been deceived," said one—"I feel sure of it."

"But how?" asked another. "Did not we all of us see him jump down? And now where is he?—neither below nor above, that I am quite certain."

Leaving them to clear up this matter in the best way they were able, we will take the reader at once out of the dark.

First, however, we should state that these officers formed no part of Skellum's band, but were a portion of the city constabulary, to the head office of which the clerk had gone after overhearing that his master's strange visitor was no other than Dick Turpin, for whose arrest so large a reward was offered.

Whether Skellum would have been as much at fault in the present business as they were, we will leave the reader to judge for himself after the explanation of what took place has been given.

At the moment, then, when Dick reached the end of the row of houses, he gave himself up to despair.

He thought that the only course left open to him was to turn at bay and die defending himself from his foes, for to overleap the space intervening between him and the next block of building was out of the power of mortal man, and there were no means visible by which he could even hope to accomplish a descent.

It was just at this juncture that he caught sight of a huge waggon loaded with straw.

It was creeping along very slowly, for the horses were weary and the burden almost beyond their powers of draught.

The straw had been piled up to what seemed to be a most dangerous height.

It was, however, well secured by numerous wain-ropes.

It could be likened to nothing but a huge stack of straw on wheels.

As Dick's eyes fell upon it, an idea suggested itself to his mind.

Compared with the distance to the street below, that which intervened between himself and the top of the waggon seemed trifling, though the reader may be sure that it was by no means inconsiderable.

Dick's idea was the desperate one of springing from the parapet to the moving mass beneath.

It was a reckless, daring deed, such as no one would think of attempting unless he valued his life most lightly.

To Dick, however, any fate was preferable to falling into the hands of his foes.

That was a triumph he was firmly determined they should never gain.

If he remained where he stood, death was certain.

If he essayed the frightful leap, there was a faint chance of escape.

Consequently, he had everything to gain, and nothing to lose, by making the attempt.

It cannot be said that he paused thus to reason with himself.

In point of fact, he did not; but these conclusions seemed present to him as though he had arrived at them by a long course of reflection.

Accordingly, he made the terrific spring.

The straw-laden waggon was immediately beneath him, and luckily close to the side of the road.

In a second Dick felt he had alighted upon the yielding, slippery mass; but he was breathless, and almost powerless.

Yet he had sense enough left to be aware that he was sliding down—falling.

With that irresistible instinct common to everyone in such cases he clutched madly with his hands in order to check his descent.

Yet down he went until his convulsive grasp encountered something tangible.

He held on with the death-grip of a drowning man.

It was a rope which he had touched, and his fingers closed round it with a pressure that scarce any power could have loosened.

In this manner, hanging by the side of the waggon, he was carried for some distance—until, indeed, he recovered himself sufficiently to comprehend where he was, and recollect what had happened.

By this time, the waggon, having turned a corner, carried him completely out of sight of the house from the top of which he had leaped, so that his foes did not even catch a sight of the vehicle which had enabled him to escape.

Dick's strength was tried severely by hanging there, with his whole weight supported by his hands; and his first consideration when he recovered possession of his faculties was, how he should extricate himself from his present uncomfortable position.

He glanced up to the top of the waggon.

The driver was in perfect ignorance of what had occurred; and Dick thought that if he could only manage to climb up on to the top of the straw by means of the cross rope he held by it would be an excellent means of getting out of the city unseen and undetected.

But, alas! he had hung down too long for him to retain the amount of strength sufficient for the performance of this feat.

He tried often before he relinquished the attempt, but each trial was feebler than the one which preceded it, and all he accomplished was the exhaustion of his own strength.

Eventually, with a heavy sigh, he was compelled to own to himself that the achievement was impossible.

He found it hard, however, to abandon this project, for the more he reflected upon it, the more certain he felt it would enable him to get clear of the city without leaving the slightest clue behind him.

But abandon it he must; and therefore, with true philosophy, he gave up speculating upon that which was impossible, and turned the whole of his attention towards the consideration of what he might perform.

One course only appeared to lay open to him.

That was to choose the earliest moment and the best opportunity for letting go his hold upon the rope and dropping to the ground.

It was most lucky for him that the streets were so completely deserted, otherwise he must have been seen clinging to the side of the waggon by the first chance pedestrian.

Looking around as well as the darkness would allow, he found that he was in a street of a particularly quiet character.

Surely, if any place was suited to the accomplishment of his purpose, this was.

He determined to hesitate no longer.

Giving a kind of spring backward, so that in alighting he should escape the wheels, he released the rope.

He measured his spring so well that he alighted upon his feet without experiencing much of a shock, though he was unable to keep his balance.

Dropping upon his hands and knees, he remained in this position until the waggon had passed on to what he considered to be a safe distance.

The driver was as unconscious of what had taken place as he was on the former occasion, and the ponderous vehicle continued on its slow but uninterrupted course.

"I must get out of York," he murmured, as he rose slowly to his feet, and brushed the dirt from his soiled apparel. "It will be madness to remain here any longer. What an escape," he added, accompanying the words with a long-drawn breath. "Who else, I wonder, would have ventured such a leap as that?"

Looking back, the feat he had performed seemed to him to be ten times more prodigious than when he had resolved upon it.

"My time has not yet come," he said to himself; and it appeared as though he tried hard to convince himself that he really thought this as well as said it. "I feel no inward monitor to tell me that my career is over. At any rate, I was not destined to perish through taking that leap."

He walked on with more briskness than might have been expected, considering the state he was in; but his recent miraculous escape—for so we may in justice term it—revived in his breast those hopes of quitting England, and made the prospect of doing so seem ten times more reasonable.

Which was the nearest and best way out of the city, he had not the remotest notion, yet he kept on

His back was turned towards the old Minster, and he was aware that if he only preserved one straight, undeviating course, he must, sooner or later, leave the city behind him.

In his progress he gazed keenly at every shadow, and when any slight or unexpected sound struck upon his ear he would instantly assume a posture of defence, as though he feared the attack of some hidden enemy.

He was agreeably surprised to find that he was much nearer the suburbs than he had dared to anticipate, and when he saw the open country before him the sight seemed to infuse fresh vigour into his wearied frame.

"I wonder, now," he said, "in what direction I am going? It is rather important that I should satisfy myself upon this point. How can I do so?"

He paused a moment, and then said:

"It is easy enough. I ought to have thought of that before. The stars are shining brightly, so that I shall have no difficulty in ascertaining my position."

He looked up at the star-bespangled firmament as he spoke.

He knew enough of the constellations to pick out the polar star, and this amount of knowledge had on more than one occasion stood him in good stead.

"I am going eastward," he muttered, in a satisfied tone. "This is just as I could wish. Can it be possible that Fortune now is about to turn my friend, and help me out of all my difficulties? It will be a pleasant thing to think so, at any rate."

In this respect he was right enough, and he trudged along the far-stretching high-road with redoubled energy.

It was not likely, however, that he would be able to continue thus very long, and so it proved.

Indeed, his strength gave out much sooner than he had expected, and consequently, though it was much against his will, he sat himself down by the roadside to rest awhile.

"I have overrated my powers," he said, sadly. "Who would have thought that I should be reduced to such a stage of feebleness? Old age seems to have dropped upon me all at once. I must be many, many miles now from the sea coast—so many that while in my present state it would be absolute insanity upon my part to dream of attempting it on foot; yet, if so, what other means of locomotion shall I adopt? Let me think—let me think."

He rested his head between his hands.

Some moments elapsed before he spoke again, and when he did speak the words were only half uttered, as they often are by persons who have no one to commune with save themselves.

"With a horse," he murmured, "I feel sure I could do it easily enough, and, what is more, in one fifth part of the time. But yet, where am I to obtain one? And besides, have I not said that I would suffer anything rather than cross another steed, accompanying it with the wish that if I ever attempted to do so the very worst evils might befall me? Yes, yes—a horse is out of the question."

But the advantages which would accrue from his availing himself of the services of one pressed more and more strongly upon his imagination—to such an extent, indeed, that presently, lifting up his head and looking around him, he exclaimed, in a louder voice:

"But is it not childish and foolish in the extreme to be the slave of such a feeling as this? Surely—oh, surely yes! They were hastily-spoken, ill-considered words, wrung from me by remorse; but when I uttered them I could not look into the future and see what would occur. Besides, it is paramount that I should use every endeavour to secure my own safety; and in thus refusing the assistance that would be afforded me by a horse, I am throwing every chance away.

"Yes, yes," he added, after another pause—"my mind is now quite made up. Every rule has its exception. I will renew my vow never to seek an adventure of any kind with another steed, but that must not prevent me from taking one when I see how imperatively necessary it is to my escape."

Having come to this conclusion, he arose.

But, strange to say, there was a heaviness now upon his mind for which he tried vainly to account, and which he as fruitlessly endeavoured to shake off.

Was it a premonition that his wish would be fulfilled?

The thought occurred to him, but he refused to dwell upon it.

"Let me think," he cried, as though resolute to keep his ideas fixed on one point—"let me consider which will be the best and most advantageous means of obtaining a horse. Where shall I look for one?"

This was indeed a point that required much careful consideration.

Secrecy was all-important.

Scarcely less so was it that the animal should be a good one, and properly equipped for the road.

"I have it!" he cried at length, rising from his seat. "I will walk on quietly along the road. I must before going very far come up with a public-house; here, if the place holds out any hopes, I will enter, and being there, will ask to buy a horse. I feel certain that I have not yet been in this part. Every object is quite strange to me, therefore I may infer that the police officers have not been here either. What fear, then, is there that I shall be recognised? At any rate, I will run the risk."

This was, to all intents and purposes, settling the matter.

Strangely enough, the next turning brought him in view of a light, which, upon a closer approach, he found proceeded from a habitation.

Whether an inn or not, he knew not.

But he was soon relieved of all uncertainty upon this head, for, by the faint light of the stars, he presently caught sight of a swinging sign, of unusually large dimensions, which was fixed on the top of a stout post.

"A good omen," he said. "Surely I am justified in looking upon this as a foretoken of good fortune in the future. No sooner have I come to a decision than I behold the place which of all others I most wished to see. Yes, yes—the end is drawing nigh. All—all will be well."

In one sense he was right.

He tried to infuse some gladness into the tone in which he spoke.

But no failure could be more complete.

His lips declared that all was well; but his heart seemed to whisper that so far from such being the case, all was ill, and that, so far from escaping, he was rushing blindly and madly to his doom.

Which was right, heart or lips? We shall quickly see.

CHAPTER MCXXIII.

DICK TURPIN FALLS A VICTIM TO THE TREACHERY OF THE OSTLER.

It did not take him long to reach the inn, or rather a portion of the outbuildings adjoining it which abutted upon the road.

"Hullo!" said a voice, suddenly. "And may I ask where you are off to at this time of night?"

Dick gave a tremendous jump, for he had not the least idea that anyone was present.

Upon hearing this voice, however, and on collecting himself a little, he caught a glimpse of a thin, wiry man, who was leaning in a negligent attitude against the post of the gate leading into the stable-yard.

Although Dick soon recovered himself from the first shock of surprise, yet he was far from feeling comfortable at finding he had not been alone.

What was more, he could not in the then agitated state of his spirits pretend to recollect what had passed his lips a short time before.

The man unquestionably had heard him.

Unless he had done so he would scarcely have addressed the fugitive in the way he did.

Dick's fear was that his incautious words would give this man a clue to his identity.

"You look as scared as though you had been up to no good," the man continued, after a long pause. "Do you always start like that when you are asked a civil question?"

His interest in Dick seemed to increase, for while thus speaking he quitted his indolent position and came closer to the roadway.

Dick then for the first time perceived that this man was attired in the garb of an ostler; and, moreover, there was about him an indescribable something which proclaimed his profession.

On discovering this, Dick's feelings underwent an entire change.

An idea occurred to him which represented itself in so favourable a light that he resolved to act upon it without delay or further deliberation.

"You may think yourself lucky," were the first words Dick spoke.

That they very much puzzled the ostler the stare of astonishment he gave sufficiently testified.

"Lucky!" he repeated, at length. "What for?"

"For having seen me."

"How so?—why?"

"Because I can put you in the way of earning in an hour more money than you could get for a year's wages."

"And pray how?—some devilry or other, I suppose?"

"Nothing of the sort; I want you to render me a service, for the faithful performance of which I am ready and willing to pay liberally."

"Indeed! And no risk to me?"

"Not a bit."

"Well, then, I'm your man—what do you want?"

"Firstly, that you will keep my presence here a secret from everyone."

"That's easily done."

"Scarcely more easily than the rest."

"Go on, then."

"You must procure me a horse of the best quality, with trappings complete; and put me in the way of reaching the sea-shore at the nearest point where I can obtain a vessel."

"And what else?"

"Nothing."

"Nothing else?"

"Nothing whatever."

"And what are you willing to pay for this?"

"Why, more for the secrecy than anything."

"You are off on the mizzle, then?"

"The what?"

"The mizzle. You have been up to something and want to get off."

"Suppose that is the case—are you willing to earn a good round sum by assisting me? No one will know anything of your share in the transaction—provided you are wise enough to keep a still tongue in your head."

"Trust me for that."

"Do you consent?"

"I do; but I must know about the amount before I stir hand or foot."

"You shall have fifty pounds."

"Not enough."

"A hundred, then."

"That's more like it."

"I will give you no more; you can either take it or decline the business altogether."

"Well. I sha'n't do that."

"Can you get me a horse?"

"I can; nothing could have fallen out better."

"Indeed!"

"Yes; I have one in the stable now that a gentleman has left here for me to sell to the best customer I can get. It is a real beauty; but, not to deceive you, is very spirited, and requires a devilish good rider to master him."

"I should like him all the better on that very account."

"Then you couldn't be better suited. Then it's a bargain. Give me your hand—there now, it's all right. Come into the stable; it's not worth while to stand out here in the cold."

"You are quite right—it is not."

Accordingly, Dick followed the ostler across the spacious inn-yard to the door of the stables, though in his progress he was careful to keep one hand upon the butt of a pistol in such a way that he could instantly avail himself of the service of the weapon should circumstances require it.

But the ostler walked straight across without once turning his head, and Dick was fully impressed with the belief that he was acting in good faith.

Yet, with proper caution, he resolved that the belief should not deprive him of vigilance, for as yet he did not know the man.

The interior of the stable boasted no better illumination than that which a candle stuck into a lantern afforded, and yet, by contrast with the darkness without, the light seemed almost brilliant.

Dick, who had been in the obscurity so long, could not help blinking a little.

The first thing the ostler did was to turn round and indulge himself in a good long stare.

His eyes opened wider and wider, until all at once, with a wild cry, he seized hold of Dick's hand and wrung it warmly.

"Why, captain—captain, whoever could have thought it was you! And to find you in such a plight, too! Well—well, I thought your voice sounded as though I had heard it before, though I could not recollect where. I am glad to see you—heartily glad. But you must tell me how it is I find you in such sad trim as this. Why, you are almost a skeleton!"

Dick was, if anything, more astonished at this second recognition than he was at the first.

There could be no mistaking the fact that the ostler knew him; and, judging by his manner, the circumstance seemed to afford him the keenest delight and satisfaction.

"Why, captain," he continued, shaking Dick's hand again with almost painful violence, "don't you know me—don't you remember me? Don't look so scared. You have found a friend now if you never had one before."

"Thanks—thanks!" said Dick, in reply to this assurance, which we need scarcely tell the reader sounded most sweetly in his ears. "I was overcome at first, but don't be surprised at that. Nothing was further from my thoughts than that I should be recognised in this part of the country."

"Do you know me now, captain?"

Dick passed his hand over his brow, as though striving to remember.

"I see, you have forgotten me."

"I see so many faces," answered Dick, "that——"

"Of course you do. Well, well—it don't matter. I know you, and that is quite as well—perhaps better. Don't be afraid to trust me. I am your friend."

He struck himself lightly on the breast as he spoke, as though he meant to indicate that his heart was entirely at the service of the fugitive.

Dick smiled.

"To utter my thanks would be impossible; but they shall speak in deeds. And now, where is the horse you spoke of?"

"Yonder. But before you go to look at him, let us have some talk. I think it will be to the benefit of both of us."

There was an earnestness in the man's tones that seemed to constrain Dick to listen.

"Are you going to leave the country for a time?"

"For ever."

"What, quit the road? Never, captain—nonsense—you must be joking!"

"Believe me, I am most serious. I have had my last adventure on the road."

Either a shadow was cast by the flickering candle at this moment upon the ostler's countenance, or else it underwent a change; but it was so transient that it was impossible to say which of the two it was, or whether it was either.

"You think so now, captain," he said; "but you won't long remain in that mind, I'll warrant."

"Indeed I shall. Nothing will induce me to alter."

"But—but what has brought about this change?"

[THE CAPTURE OF DICK TURPIN AT THE ROADSIDE INN.]

"I have lost all my friends—not one of my associates is left to me. Even Black Bess is lost to me for ever; and the remains of one I loved dearer than life and the whole world lie under the sod of another land! My heart has been too much bruised and wounded for me to become a knight of the road again."

"Pooh—pooh, captain! Take my word for it, that is all stuff. You will soon get the better of it, and then you will wonder how ever it was that you came to have such ideas. Don't shake your head in that solemn way. You will find out I am right before long."

"No—no—a thousand times no!"

"Have you, then, really made up your mind?"

"I have."

"Then I am sorry to hear it, and yet not surprised either."

"Why not?"

"Because you are reduced to such a dreadful state You are out of condition, captain—that's what's the matter with you. I know what a horse is when he's out of condition. Lor' bless you—after he has been seen to a bit no one would believe him the same. And men and osses is wonderfully alike, captain, I assure you."

Dick smiled at this, but shook his head again to imply that his determination was unshaken.

"I am right," continued the ostler; "and mark my words—things will turn out to prove it. Let me tell you a man don't live in a stable all his life without being up to a thing or two."

"I am weak and ill, I know," returned Dick; "but you would not wonder at that if you knew what I have gone through; still it would have no effect upon my determination—it has long been taken."

"Well, captain, of course I ain't going to presume to

No. 251 will be Published next Monday.

to dictate to you, of course, but I'm not going to hold an argument with you either while you are in your present state."

"Indeed!"

"I am quite in earnest. It is folly for you to think of continuing your journey while you are in your present state. You couldn't do it. You shall stop here awhile. I'll keep you snug enough, never fear, and I will get you plenty of good things, and you will soon have your strength back again."

Dick was never in all his life more in the humour to be persuaded than he was then, and at the very time the ostler was speaking such a frightful feeling of fatigue and weakness came over him that he had much difficulty in saving himself from falling.

The keen-eyed ostler noticed his condition, and cried:

"What did I tell you! If you persist in leaving here while you are like this you will be nabbed before you are half a dozen hours older."

"But could you conceal me," asked Dick, anxiously, "supposing the officers should call here?"

"I'll take care of all that. Look here, captain—just you follow me."

So saying, the ostler crossed the stable to a place where a ladder was fixed perpendicularly against the wall.

Up this he climbed with the agility which long practice had given him.

In the twinkling of an eye he was upon the loft above holding his hand to assist Dick in the ascent.

The best way to give an idea of the pitiable condition to which Dick Turpin was reduced will be to say that this task was almost beyond his powers, and that he would never have accomplished it without the aid of his new friend.

"Now, captain," the ostler said, as soon as Dick had gained the floor of the loft above, "you see this here place. Good. Well, I will keep you here as snug as you wish for as long as you think proper. I'll take care that no one finds out where you are, and will guarantee you as much as ever you want in the shape of eating and drinking."

"I assure you your offer is a most agreeable one, and I am more than half inclined to accept of it."

"Have a whole mind, captain, and rely upon it you will be all right. How can anyone have the least suspicion you are here. And if you stay you will not only be getting your strength up, but the heat of the pursuit after you will have cooled a little."

"I will stay," said Dick, with sudden resolution. "Fortunately, I have enough left even in this extremity of my fortunes to reward you most liberally for all that you may do for me."

"We sha'n't fall out over that, captain, I am sure. Now listen to what I am going to say."

Dick flung himself down wearily upon the hay with which the floor of the loft was covered.

"That's right, captain," cried the ostler, approvingly. "Take all the rest you can."

"What were you going to propose?"

"Why, that you stayed here until you had regained your strength. Of course, as I said before, I shall supply you with everything for that purpose. Then, at the proper time, I shall mount you on the horse I spoke of, and he will carry you to the sea-coast like a rocket. He is truly a wonderful animal."

Dick could not help being sensible that the ostler's advice was good, and that he could not do better than follow it in every particular, yet so much had he fixed his mind upon continuing his journey to the coast, that he could hardly make himself satisfied to pause anywhere.

But this feeling was not so overpowering as to blind him to the fact that it would be by no means lost time to remain here until he was stronger, because then he would be able to perform the journey in half the time he would be obliged to take while in his present condition.

"I can see you have decided, captain," the ostler continued; "I am glad of it, for you always treated me like a prince in the good old times, and nothing pleases me so much as to be able to do something in return for a favour."

He did not wait to see whether Dick had any more to say, but lowered himself down into the stable again.

It was not long, however, before he returned, bringing with him a very tempting supply of provisions, together with a bottle of wine.

"There," he said, "just let me see you polish that lot off; and when you have you will be disposed to take a more cheerful view of the future than you do now."

Dick ate heartily, and found the wine particularly agreeable and refreshing.

"Now, captain, am I not right?"

"I am better."

"Of course you are. Now, look here: it is too late now for you to think of leaving here to-night, even if you had made your mind up to do so, because we shall have daylight here in no time. So just make yourself as comfortable as you can on the top of the hay, and then if you don't like to stay any longer you will be ready to start to-morrow night as soon as darkness sets in."

Dick willingly enough assented to this, and after a few more words the ostler left the loft.

The reader will not require to be told that Dick now felt himself under circumstances of greater security than he had known for a long time past; and therefore it is not surprising that he should fall asleep very soon after being left alone.

It was rather strange, though, that he should place so much confidence in this ostler, but somehow the idea of being doubtful of his good faith never once occurred to him.

There was such an air of jollity and truth about him that suspicion was blinded and disarmed.

Perhaps had Dick not been so utterly "out of condition," as the ostler phrased it, he would have been a little cautious, and that there was great need of caution will be quickly seen.

No sooner had the ostler reached the stable than he sat himself down upon the corn-bin in an attitude of deep thought.

What reflections were passing in his mind it would be hard for anyone to say.

That they were important, however, there could be no doubt.

At last he began to mutter in an undertone.

His words ran to something like the following effect:

"Which way shall I decide? Blest if I can tell! But I must make up my mind one way or other. Is his race run?—that is the question. If I could only get a reply to that I should know how to act."

He rose up as he spoke, for a faint sound from above fell upon his ears.

After listening for a second, and finding it was not repeated, he leaned his arms on the lower portion of the stable door and looked out into the darkness.

"He seems determined enough to quit the road," he continued; "and I have heard say before now, that when he once made up his mind to a thing there was no turning him. Let me see. Suppose it is so—why, should not I be a downright idiot to let him get off for the sake of a hundred pounds or so! Of course I should!"

Having settled this point, he remained for a short time silent.

But his mutterings soon recommenced.

"My business is to make the most money—that's just the long and the short of it. If I am careful and move right, I am in for a good haul—such an amount as will make me independent for the rest of my days. But one false step, and I lose the lot."

The ostler's excitement continued to increase.

"Let me see," he said. "I will get the bill out again, and see just how much is offered for his apprehension. Let me make sure about that."

He sat himself down again upon the corn-bin, and from a tattered pocket-book produced one of the printed bills offering the reward for the apprehension of Dick Turpin.

Unfolding it upon his knee, he spelt it over carefully.

First, the amount offered for his safe-lodgment in any one of his Majesty's prisons was one thousand pounds, and five hundred pounds more on his conviction and execution.

The ostler gave a long-drawn sigh, and returned the bill to his pocket-book.

"That's clear enough," he said. "But can I get the whole amount?—that's the question. There is a doubt about that—so let me see how much I should be likely to make by standing his friend."

This seemed no easy thing to arrive at.

"He said he would reward me liberally—and I should understand that word to mean a thousand pounds, but I don't suppose he does. Has he got anything like such a sum about him? That is just what I should like to find out; and I don't intend, either, to lose sight of the old proverb about a bird in the hand."

From the foregoing it will be seen that this north-country ostler had no higher motive than many of our most illustrious men—to adopt that course which would turn out most profitable to himself—or, in other words, to dispose of his fidelity to the person who bid the highest price for it.

If Dick had only got enough to satisfy his avarice, Justice might catch her prisoner herself.

This important point—because it would entirely influence his future conduct—the ostler determined to clear up, and the means he took to do this were as bold as they were effectual.

As silently as possible, he made his way up into the loft.

Dick was slumbering heavily.

"It would take rather more than a trifle to wake him now," he murmured. "That wine was strong, and he was quite exhausted. It would be easy enough to find out how much he is worth, and I don't think there would be much fear of waking him up either. At any rate, I shall run the risk."

With these words the ostler very cautiously and gently made an examination of Dick's pockets.

It was not very easy to make an estimate of what he was worth, because the greater part of the wealth was in the more portable shape of precious stones.

He restored everything as he had found it, and slipped down into the stable again.

"Samuel," he said, addressing himself—"Samuel, you have a difficult course before you. One is right, the other is wrong. What have I to guide me in my choice? All depends upon it. I shall either get all or nothing. Shall I befriend him, and be content with perhaps an amount equal to one-third of the reward? I must think."

Samuel did think, but he found it by no means easy to come to a decision.

There were no scruples in the case.

His sole anxiety, as we have said before, was to do that which would bring him the most money.

Whether Dick was hanged, or whether he escaped, was to him equally indifferent.

He had no more regard for serving Justice than he had compunction in meditating the betrayal of one who had placed such utter confidence in him.

"Suppose I make up my mind to give him up, what are the difficulties in the way?—what chance have I of getting the money, and how much risk of losing it? I will sit down again; I can always think with a clearer head when I am sitting on the corn-bin.

"It would never do to call in any assistance," he ruminated, "and certainly not the police, because they would want to share the reward, and I could not afford that. No, no—I must scheme it somehow. Supposing I was to bind him tightly with plenty of rope, and then, without saying a word to anybody, to put a horse into one of the carts and drive to York Castle with him? I don't see anything very difficult about that; and when once I had handed him over to the Governor's charge I should be making sure of a thousand pounds. No one could gainsay my claim to it—certainly not."

Yet the ostler was not satisfied.

He could hardly bring himself to believe that it was possible he should become possessed of so large an amount.

The blood tingled in his veins, and for some time the excitement produced by his anticipations was so great that he could do nothing but yield himself up to the influence of a kind of waking dream.

At last one thought returned.

"How easy it would be to bind him now that he lies sleeping—there would be an end to it. He could not resist. He would be powerless. Fool—fool that I was not to think of that before! What valuable time I have permitted to slip by! It is now too late, though—now too late, of course!"

And it was too late, for, to his infinite chagrin, he found, on once more making his way into the hay-loft, that Dick was awake.

What had aroused him it was, of course, impossible to guess.

The ostler showed himself to be an accomplished dissembler.

"I thought I heard you moving, captain," he said, with the utmost self-possession, and without the ruffling of a single feature, "and so I came up to see what you wanted."

"Thanks—thanks," said Dick—"all is so far well. What is the time?"

"Just about sunrise, captain."

"Alas—alas!"

"What is the matter?"

"I have had a dream—an ugly, uncomfortable dream. Bah!—I——"

"Pooh, pooh! captain—you must get the better of this sort of thing."

But Dick shuddered in a way that showed this dream had produced no ordinary impression upon him.

"I will leave here at nightfall," he said—"yes, yes—I will leave here at nightfall. I will take this vision as a warning: nothing shall induce me to stay longer—I fear, indeed, that I have stayed too long already."

"Why, captain, you get worse and worse," cried the ostler, speaking in as pleased a voice as he could affect, and turning aside so as to conceal the baleful-looking light which these words had caused to blaze up in his eyes. "Whatever could this dream be to trouble you so much?"

"I dreamt," said Dick, "that I was in a deep sleep, and yet half conscious of what was going on. But at last I awoke, and when I opened my eyes it was to find that I was surrounded by stone walls; an iron grating was in front of me—I was the inmate of a prison cell."

CHAPTER MCXXIV.

THE OSTLER DISCOVERS THAT THINGS DO NOT TURN OUT QUITE SO AGREEABLY AS HE ANTICIPATED.

"Now, captain—captain, do not let such a thing as that trouble you—pray, don't," cried the ostler, with a hearty laugh. "After making such a meal as you did, and falling asleep immediately afterwards, you might have expected to dream about that which you were most in dread of."

"It may be so," replied Dick—"it may be so; but I shall not rest again until I am on my journey."

"Oh yes, you will. Keep yourself quiet, or what will you be fit for at night? As soon as the folks in the inn are astir I will see after your breakfast."

Dick poured out his thanks to this unworthy object, who, feeling uncomfortable at having that which he felt he was not entitled to, feigned that it was necessary to descend into the stable and see to the horses there.

Dick said not a word respecting his departure.

The fact was, his senses were all wrapped up in pondering upon his dream, which had been of unusual vividness.

Samuel no sooner reached the stable than he walked deliberately to the wall and struck his head several times with great violence against it.

"I have been a d—d fool," he muttered, grinding his teeth ferociously. "I do believe I am the d—dest fool alive! Here have I been argufying with myself when I ought to have been at work. If I had had a grain of sense he would have been safe where he dreamt he was."

The ostler was in a state of very great aggravation, and some time elapsed before he could bring himself to anything like calmness.

But a fresh thought occurred to him, which went a good way towards reconciling him to the present aspect of affairs.

"I have often heard," he said, "that nothing is done well which is done in a hurry, and I believe it now. How could I have overlooked such a thing as that? Why, I am a double gainer if I can be successful."

It will quickly be seen to what the treacherous fellow alluded, for he sat himself down in his favourite place, and, holding one hand before him with the fingers outspread, he said:

"Let me take it all over quietly from first to last, to make sure all is smooth, and to prevent any unexpected hack in the business. Now, first, I will wait till towards nightfall, and then give him a drug either in his food or drink, or both. Good! Then, when he is insensible, I shall make it my first business to search every one of his pockets thoroughly, and make up all his wealth into a parcel, which I will hide carefully. Good again! What a fool I must have been to think of taking him to prison with all that in his pocket!"

The ostler was for a moment or two so overcome with astonishment that he could not continue his most agreeable meditations.

"Having buried the parcel," he continued, "I will lift him quietly into the cart, and, without his being one bit the wiser, drive him to York Castle. Once there, the authorities will look to him. I shall send in my claim for the entire reward, and then, with that, and what he carries about with him, I shall be rich—rich indeed!"

For some moments he sat like one entranced.

He was quite carried away by the agreeable prospect which he had conjured up.

Already he saw himself—what he so longed to be—a rich man.

At last he started up, and, in tones that certainly were louder than it was prudent to make use of, he cried:

"Were the risk a thousand times what it is, I would do it!"

From this moment his mind remained quite made up.

He did not waver in the least, and so great were his dissimulative powers that no one to have gazed into his countenance would have given a guess at the nature of his thoughts.

True to his promise, he obtained an excellent breakfast for the hunted fugitive, who little guessed in what tremendous danger he stood, though there was a peculiar heaviness about his heart and oppression about his spirits which he ought to have understood and taken as a warning.

But, alas! he did not.

Perhaps never was there anyone in whom Dick was more disposed to place an absolute trust than in this treacherous, mercenary wretch who was so wholly undeserving of it.

But Dick throughout all his career had gained so much by trusting people, and suffered so little from treachery, that we cannot blame him, nor wonder at his over-confidence in this instance.

It was a strange thing that during the day Dick could not close his eyes in sleep.

It could not be that he feared anything, for he was wholly ignorant of the ostler's intention.

Perhaps it was the dread of renewing his dream that influenced him in keeping awake.

Whatever the cause was, however, there was the fact—sleep was impossible.

Consequently the day was a tediously long one to Dick.

He had no other means of whiling away the time saving peeping forth from the circular window of the loft, from which, in the distance, a view of York could be obtained.

Strange to say, he saw nothing of the police officers, and as the day elapsed without his having done so his hopes begun to rise and much of the weight was taken off his heart.

All would have been well, no doubt, but for the act of treachery the ostler meditated.

Dick saw but little of him during daylight.

The fact was, he could not drive this matter from his mind, and he was afraid to trust himself much in the presence of his intended victim lest his face should betray the black secret in his heart.

Dick Turpin, as soon as ever it was dusk, left the loft and descended into the stable.

"The coast seems clear, captain," the ostler exclaimed.

"It does. I believe all will be well."

"And you are still determined to give up your life on the road?"

"If possible, more so than I have ever been. My resolution has never wavered."

"Well, I'm sorry to hear it, that is all I can say, for of course you are at liberty to adopt whatever course you may think proper."

Dick did not think it worth while to make any reply to this speech.

"Where is the horse you spoke to me about? Let me see him."

"He is a real beauty—he is, and no mistake, and so you'll say. Just look here!"

The ostler lifted the cloth off one of the horses in the stall as he spoke.

Dick looked at him with a critical eye.

"And you say he is a good one?"

"There never was a better; only, as I told you, he takes a good rider. If I was a gentleman I should prefer him for that. I should not care to have an animal that anyone could sit on the back of."

"He will serve my purpose doubtless. What is the price?"

"Only fifty guineas, which is what the owner told me would be the very lowest penny he would take. He cost a hundred, and is well worth it too."

"I will buy him," said Dick, "and you shall have something handsome over and above that amount by way of commission."

The ostler hardly had patience to play his part in this portion of the affair, but he was afraid of doing anything to rouse Dick's suspicions, which would, of course, ruin his project entirely.

"And now," Dick continued, "if you will furnish me with a saddle and a bridle, I will be off without any more delay."

"You shall have both, captain; and, what is more, a bottle of brandy which I have procured for you. Keep it by you—it will prove useful."

"I will taste it now," Dick answered.

This was what the ostler had calculated upon.

As the reader doubtless more than expects, the brandy was drugged.

He gave Dick a glass, who, drawing the cork, nearly filled it with the spirit from the bottle.

"You will find that a drop of splendid stuff, captain. Lor' bless you, I know whereabouts in the cellar master keeps the best of everything—trust me for that! But what's the matter with you?"

Dick had placed the fatal draught to his lips.

It was so long since he had tasted any of his favourite spirit that in his eager haste he swallowed a large mouthful without tasting it.

It was when he paused and licked his lips with the tip of his tongue that the ostler broke off and asked what was the matter.

"It seems to have an odd taste," Dick said.

"Age—age, captain—nothing more. Try it again."

Dick once more placed the glass to his lips.

He sipped dubiously.

A little more had been swallowed, when he happened suddenly to catch sight of the ostler's visage.

The expression upon it told him all as plainly as the longest explanation.

He was betrayed.

The excitement of the ostler had reached fever point; and when he saw Dick in the act of swallowing the second draught, he could no more prevent his features displaying his triumph and exultation than he could have stopped the pulsations of his heart.

This, coupled with the strange taste of the spirit, which was now very noticeable, told Dick that he had been betrayed by the being he had so trusted, and who had spoken so fairly to him.

"Villain!" he shrieked, rather than said, for the consequences of what would follow drinking the drugged brandy rushed with full force upon his brain—"villain! you have betrayed me!"

As he pronounced the last words, he dashed the remainder of the spirit into the rascal's face.

His aim was good.

The ostler was temporarily deprived of sight.

"Base, accursed wretch!" continued Turpin, now in a perfect frenzy. "But you shall not reap the benefit of what you have done! I see through it all! I can at least inflict that punishment upon you!"

So saying, he drew his sword.

It was at this moment that the ostler recovered himself a little.

Maddened with pain, he made a frantic rush upon the fugitive.

He did not see the sword.

Dick held it firmly in front of him, with the hilt pressing against his breast.

The ostler did not pause, and consequently he was impaled upon it.

"Villain!" shrieked Dick. "Take your doom! You did not think that you had been so cleverly plotting your own destruction as well as mine!"

A fearful groan came from the ostler's lips, and, throwing up his arms, he fell backwards to the ground.

When the sword was thus violently withdrawn, the blood gushed forth in a manner that seemed to indicate the wound would prove a mortal one.

"Such a death is too good for you," said Dick, sheathing his sword, all covered with blood as it was. "Yours is a righteous fate, and may such ever be the doom of the traitor!"

He reeled as he spoke, and a strange tumult seemed taking place in his brain.

"What will be the end?" he cried, clasping his hands before his eyes, for they throbbed most painfully—"what will be the end? What was the strength of that accursed drug?"

It was plain that every moment it was asserting its influence.

The dying ostler bent upon him a look of hate that was none the less malignant because so powerless.

"Your race is run," he said. "This is your last deed! But I shall live—live to see you hanging in front of York Castle before many more days are over your head!"

"Never!" screamed Dick, who was now quite maddened by the mixture he had swallowed. "I—I——"

He paused, and again clasped his hands over his painfully-throbbing eyes.

A momentary return of consciousness had taken place.

"What can I do?" he murmured, sadly—"what can I do? Water—water!"

Looking around, his eyes fell upon a stable bucket full of the wished-for liquid.

He intended at first to drink, but his whole brain seemed to be on fire, and it was in obedience to an irresistible impulse that he plunged his head completely into the water.

Oh, how coolly and refreshingly it bubbled round his neck and in his ears!

Thus he remained until want of breath compelled him to withdraw.

He was wonderfully better, and, finding this to be the case, he took a long breath and repeated his bath.

This time he stayed longer still.

He was much refreshed.

His brain was chilled—his eyes no longer seemed as though they would force themselves from their sockets.

"I must not linger here," he said—"this is no place for me. Away—away! If I can but crawl to some lonely spot and lie down and sleep, that will be the best way of getting rid of the effects of the drug. Yes, yes—away—away! I must leave England—England!"

The way in which he finished his sentence showed that the water had only produced a transient effect, and one, too, that was more apparent than real.

He staggered out of the stable.

Fortunately for him, it was growing dusk, and there was no one in sight.

Everything he looked at seemed in motion.

The ground rose and fell under his feet like billows on the ocean.

The symptoms he experienced were just those of complete intoxication.

The fresh air appeared to affect him strongly.

Whether it would enable him to overcome the effects of the drug, or whether it would accelerate its action, was hard indeed to say.

But Dick continued to stumble and stagger on.

Each moment he seemed about to fall, but he would recover his balance miraculously, and resume his devious way.

He knew he was going on, but with that fact it may be said consciousness begun and ended.

What lay before him—whether it was turf or roadway on which he trod—whether he was going towards York—were perfect mysteries.

So stupified did he rapidly become, that he ceased to trouble himself in the least degree upon these points, or to feel at all curious about them.

Motion was more mechanical than aught else.

Still, with sleepy, vacant eyes he gazed around, but his glances had no speculation in them.

Yet he felt no desire to sleep.

Whether this was owing to his not having drunk a sufficient quantity of the drug, or his having immersed his head in cold water in the way we have described, we know not.

How long he continued on this staggering course he had no means of judging.

He fancied it must be long, for he was very, very weary.

Painfully he gazed from side to side, looking out for some place of rest, but finding none.

Had he really paused, the probability is that he would very quickly have become totally insensible.

More than one chance passenger stopped to look at him and watch his erratic steps, for his motions were precisely those of a drunken man, and this was what he was taken to be.

Not one of his observers chanced to guess at his identity, and so, without knowing it, they allowed a large sum to slip through their fingers when they might easily have retained it.

But what a strange fatality it was that directed Dick, while in this helpless state, towards the City of York!

Had he turned precisely the opposite way there might have been some chance for him.

But what hope had he in thus rushing blindly upon the spot which of all others threatened him with the most danger!

Yet so it was.

Every step he took was only carrying him nearer to his foes.

But not even in the dreamy way that he knew he was in motion was Dick conscious of this terrible mistake.

With a strange confidence he went on, his mind so utterly stultified that he never for one single instant entertained the suspicion that he might be going wrong.

When he felt so weary that it seemed as though he could not go any further, he caught sight of an inn.

It was not far off, and on the pleasant bit of green lawn—if we may so term it—several rustic seats had been placed for the accommodation of those guests who might prefer to sit al fresco in the summer time.

Oh, how inviting those seats looked to the worn-out fugitive!

Could he only sit for a short time on one of them he believed he should recover himself sufficiently to take steps for his ultimate escape.

The temptation was not to be resisted.

Staggering on with the same swaying gait until he reached one of the twisted wood tables, he sat himself down on the seat near it, and immediately buried his burning forehead in his hands.

His approach had been noticed and commented on by several, especially the landlord, who, long pipe in mouth, was watching the progress of a rubber at bowls.

"Francis," he said, addressing himself to the man who was waiting on the customers, "that cove yonder has had enough, it seems to me. Don't fill him any more if you can help it; let him be awhile—he may recover. At any rate, I'll have an eye upon him."

From this it would seem that the landlord entertained no suspicion as to the identity of the new-comer.

Dick had not sat at the table long before two or three labouring men sat down beside him.

The noise made by them aroused him.

The stupifying effects of the drug seemed to have worn off somewhat even in this brief space, but its influence was by no means gone.

It manifested itself in a different manner.

With bloodshot, aching eyes, he glared around him.

He felt frenzied—maddened, impelled to do some outrageous deed or other.

It was as though some demoniac spirit had taken possession of his breast.

He was in the mood to quarrel with anyone—to interfere with anything.

It was such a disposition indeed which is often manifested by those who are in a certain stage of intoxication.

All at once his ears were assailed by a loud cheer coming from many throats.

"What's that?" he hickuped, in a thick voice, and at the same time half rising—"what's that, I say?"

The game at bowls had just been concluded, and the wager decided.

It would seem that no ordinary interest had attached to the game, and the triumphant sounds were in honour of the victor.

But surely some demon must nave taken possession of Dick's body and directed its movements—it hardly seems credible that he acted in accordance with the dictates of his own mind.

After many efforts, he contrived to stand somewhat steadily upon his legs.

Then he rolled his heavy, bloodshot eyes around until he caught sight of the tumultuous group assembled round the players.

No sooner did he comprehend who they were and what they were about than he reeled towards them.

"Who's won?" he asked, elbowing his way among the throng—"who's won, I say?—I don't care who he is, here's a man here that can beat him—I can do it! I'll bowl the winner or anybody here for any money! I'll bet anybody fifty pounds to five shillings I am the winner!

"What are you all afraid of?" he continued, in a thicker and more inarticulate voice than ever, and looking as though he would be only too glad to enter into a quarrel with anyone upon the slightest provocation. "I ask are you all afraid, or do you think I have no money about me? If that's it you're wrong. Look here! What do you think of that, now?"

While speaking, he plunged his hand into his pocket and drew forth as many guineas as he could grasp.

"Here you are. Here's money enough, and I'll bet you all I tell you!"

With the utmost recklessness, he flung the coins upon the nearest table, upon which many remained, but more fell off and rolled along the grass.

Such behaviour as this was well calculated to excite the astonishment of the rustics assembled at the inn.

When they saw the gold, they immediately felt a great accession of respect.

The general idea was that he was some gentleman—no doubt a lord—who was the worse for liquor, and from whom, most likely, they would all be able to pick up a trifle by humouring him.

Acting upon this idea, the man who had just been vanquished touched his hat.

"I'll bowl your lordship, if your lordship pleases."

"Done!" hickuped Dick. "Down with your five shillings, and here's my fifty pounds."

He placed a quantity of uncounted gold upon the table—certainly more than the amount he had named.

"Now, then," he cried, "for the game!"

The preparations were soon made, and Dick allowed to bowl first.

His antagonist was quite willing to make him any such allowance as this, because he felt sure of winning.

Dick poised the bowl with tipsy gravity, and affected to take the most careful aim.

But when the biased ball left his hand, it rolled, as might be expected, very far way indeed from the jack.

His other efforts were no better, and, of course, there was no doubt that he had lost.

But envy would not let the others allow one of their number to profit so largely by what had happened.

Cries of shame were raised; and more than one declared that it was nothing but barefaced robbery to take the gentleman's money.

"It is—it is," said the landlord. "He is not in a state to play—he is not steady enough."

Incautiously, the landlord spoke these words in a tone sufficiently loud to reach Dick Turpin's ears.

He turned round with an angry scowl, and made his way towards him with angry gestures.

"Do you insult me, you d—d tun-bellied rascal? I'll—I'll——"

A hickup stopped his further speech; and just at the same moment a cock flew up on to the low wall close by, and, flapping his wings, crowed lustily.

Dick's attention was at once attracted to this new object.

"My hand isn't steady, isn't it?" he muttered. "But you're a liar, Mr. Landlord, and this shall prove it!"

At the same time, and without anyone present having the least notion of what he was about to do, he drew a pistol, and raising it, suddenly pulled the trigger.

So rapidly was all this done that there did not seem to be time for him to take aim; certainly no one was quick enough to prevent him.

There was a loud report, and the cock, who had been so exultant a moment before, fell ignominiously into the dust, with his feathers all dabbled in blood, and in the last agonies of death.

"Who says my hand isn't steady now?" Dick asked, with an air of triumph, as he flung the pistol from him.

"I say you are a d—d fool!" responded the landlord, angrily. "You shall pay dearly for it!"

"What do you say?"

"You have shot my favourite bird!" said the landlord, displaying more violent passion than one would have expected on such an occasion. "There isn't such a game cock in all the ridings of Yorkshire as that! I wouldn't have parted with him for any money!"

Dick regarded him with a stupid, besotted stare.

In the meanwhile, some of the bystanders had picked up the game cock and brought it towards the house.

The sight of the bird thus suddenly and wantonly slaughtered redoubled the landlord's resentment.

Flourishing his clenched fist in Dick's face, he resumed:

"I'll have the law on you for this! It shall be the dearest bit of sport you ever had in the whole course of your life!"

"Get back," said Dick, drawing another pistol—"get back, I say! What do I care? If you will get up on the top of the wall and flap your wings and crow, I'll d—d soon shoot you; and think no more about it than I did about shooting him! Perhaps you'll think twice before you insult a gentleman again."

During this speech his voice grew thicker and thicker.

The last words were all but inarticulate.

A rush of blood seemed to force its way into his head, his eyes clouded, and he sank almost insensible upon the nearest seat.

But the landlord's exasperation was much increased by Dick's threat, more especially as it had been greeted by a general laugh.

"I will have the law on him!" he cried. "Yes will I, even if he was the King of England, and if it cost me all the money I am worth!"

CHAPTER MCXXV.

DICK TURPIN AWAKES TO FIND HIMSELF THE INMATE OF A PRISON CELL.

THE landlord fully meant what he said.

The game cock was the one living thing above all others which he loved and prized the most, and it was more than he could endure to see it thus wantonly slaughtered.

Accordingly, he beckoned one of his servants to him, and despatched him for the police.

A very short time elapsed before he returned, accompanied by several constables and police officers belonging to the City of York; but not any of those under Mr. Skellam's command.

These were, indeed, in quite another part of the country, hunting vainly for traces of the fugitive.

"There he is," said the landlord—"arrest him."

"Why, the gentleman's dead drunk! What's the charge?"

"Threatening my life and shooting my game cock. Take him up, I say!"

One of the officers stepped up to Dick, who was as yet unconscious of their arrival, and tapped him on the shoulder.

"You must come with us," he said. "Don't make any fuss."

These words are quite sufficient to show that the officers had not the remotest suspicion of Dick's identity.

By this time the poor fugitive had all but succumbed to the subtle influence of the drug.

He started upon feeling a hand laid upon him, and looked up vacantly.

Yet, stupified as he was, he comprehended that it was an officer standing in such close proximity to him.

With a loud cry thrilling from his lips, he started to his feet.

The sight of his foes galvanised him into life.

As sometimes a sudden shock will almost sober a drunken man, so did the knowledge of the fearful peril in which he stood enable the fugitive to triumph over the insidious power of the drug.

In another moment a most violent struggle commenced.

The first officer received a terrific blow upon the head with the butt end of Dick's pistol, which laid him flat as suddenly as if he had been struck down with a pole-axe.

Upon seeing this attack, the others quickly closed round him, calling in a loud voice upon those standing by to render their assistance.

The struggle was terrific.

Despite the number of his foes. Dick managed to draw his sword; and no doubt many would have suffered severely had it not been wrenched from his hand by one who was bolder and stronger than the rest.

Dick's strength, too, was beginning to fail him.

His blood was too much loaded by the drug for him to be able very long to retain the mastery over it.

Besides, it was not possible for anyone to fight successfully against such odds as were opposed to him.

They hemmed him round.

Many hands seized him.

The landlord clutched him by the throat.

Another officer managed to secure a rope round one of his arms.

It was at this moment that a horseman, mounted on a steed of jetty blackness, was riding along the high-road before the inn.

It was now almost dark—at least, distant objects looked obscure and dim.

Seeing the contention that was going on, this stranger, animated apparently by curiosity, rode up to see what was the cause of it.

When he saw so many attacking one who seemed to be helplessly drunk, he was about to interfere.

But just as he uttered the first words of angry indignation, Dick relapsed into total insensibility, and would have fallen backwards to the ground had he not been held up by those officers who stood behind him.

He was now securely pinioned by the rope, and even now the officers failed to recognise him.

Indeed, that Dick Turpin should be reduced to this condition was so unlikely a circumstance that it never once occurred to them.

But the stranger who had just arrived looked somewhat curiously upon the bruised and dust-covered figure of the fugitive.

"Who is it?" he asked; and as the tumult had somewhat subsided his question was attended to.

The landlord—who was one of those who always had an eye to business, and fancied he saw in the new-comer a customer—said, respectfully:

"It's a gentleman a little overcome, sir—that's it, and, as you see, uncommon violent."

The police officers looked upon the stranger, and immediately began to whisper to each other.

"That's Captain Hawk!" cried one. "Seize him—seize him!"

But Captain Hawk—for it was indeed no other—merely tightened the rein a little, and his magnificent steed rose upon his hind legs, and pawed the air with its fore ones in such a way as to make it particularly unsafe for anyone to approach too near.

"Good evening, gentlemen all!" he said, with an ironical bow. "If you are inclined to exercise the muscles of your legs a little you have an excellent opportunity, for I am off! Good night!"

"Ten thousand curses on the fellow's impudence!" said one of the officers, as Captain Hawk galloped off. "That's just about like him. But he will come it too strong one of these days. I know he will, and then it will be all up with him."

The officers were wise enough to see that it would be quite labour in vain for them to attempt to pursue a mounted man, so they did not offer to stir, but turned the whole of their attention to the capture they had just made.

Captain Hawk was quickly lost to view in the darkness.

It may seem strange that he should not recognise the prisoner; but it is quite certain that he did not.

And could a tolerably good idea be formed of the dejected, wasted, bruised, and bleeding object which Dick was at that moment, the circumstance would by no means have been wondered at.

It was also too dark for anything to be seen with due distinctness.

From a combination of all these causes, then, it happened that Captain Hawk passed by his friend and left him at a moment when he could have been of the utmost service to him.

Yet so it was, and Dick was left absolutely at the mercy of his foes.

The officers were in no hurry to remove him; and, having satisfied themselves that he was secure, they laid him at full length on one of the tables, and proceeded to regale themselves at the expense of the landlord, from whose lips they received a full account of what had taken place.

"You are sure he's a gentleman?" remarked one of the officers, interrogatively.

"Quite sure of it. He has no end of money upon him, and he threw it about just like dirt."

"Then he may think himself lucky, for if he wasn't I can tell you this would turn out a very bad evening's sport for him."

At length, a cart having been procured, Dick, still as insensible as at first, was placed in it, and, at a leisurely pace, made their way towards the castle, used then, as now, as a prison for all kinds of criminals.

On their arrival, the landlord of the public-house specified his charge against the prisoner, swearing that he had threatened to take his life.

The officers also deposed to the manner in which he had resisted the execution of their duty.

His name no one knew.

Dick was still senseless.

His pockets were examined; but, of course, nothing was found that gave the least clue to his identity.

The amount of money found upon his person gave colour to the landlord's statement that he was a gentleman; but the largeness of the sum caused just a little suspicion.

Being looked upon also as a more than usually desperate character, he was carried into one of the strongest cells, and there left to come to himself as best he might.

And this was the strange manner in which Dick Turpin at last had fallen into the hands of his foes.

Of what avail were those often-made protestations that he would never surrender alive?

And yet there he was, lying in a cell perfectly helpless.

It is true he was not known, but after what had taken place the probability was slight that he would for very long remain unrecognised.

From what has been related, the reader will be able to estimate tolerably well the strength of the drug the treacherous ostler had administered.

Had Dick drank off the whole of the glass of brandy the probability is that he would have fallen senseless as soon as he had swallowed the last drop.

He was quite unconscious—quite dead to all around him—quite ignorant of where he was.

And so he remained through the long hours of the tedious night, until the first glimmer of light found its way into his dungeon.

Then he stirred slightly.

But he did not thoroughly wake up for some moments after.

There was an awful sensation in his brain as though it was splitting in two pieces.

His eyes were so heavy that he could scarcely raise the lids, and, feeble as the light was which found its way into that place, yet some time elapsed before he could bear it.

"There am I?" he murmured, at last as something like returning recollection came over him. "What happened last? Why," he added, almost with a shriek, as he started up and glared around him, "this is my dream again!"

a frightful sensation of weakness and sickness at this moment assailed him, and, striving madly to clutch the air and save himself, he fell heavily to the ground.

Here he remained for some time—until, indeed, recollection came back to him.

One point was very clear.

That was that he had swallowed a quantity of drugged brandy, and that he had discovered it just in time to punish the ostler for his treachery.

After that all was blurred and indistinct, nor could he, with all his efforts, call up a remembrance of after events.

With respect to his arrival at the roadside inn, and all that had occurred there, his memory was a perfect blank.

After this he arose.

He was not quite satisfied whether all this was or was not a dream.

"I had a vision like this once before," he said—"when I awoke from my slumber in the loft. Is this a repetition of it or is it the reality?"

There was little likelihood that he would remain very long in doubt upon this point.

Struggling to his feet, he managed to cross the narrow flooring of his cell.

One touch of the cold stone sufficed.

He was satisfied that he was the inmate of a dungeon.

To describe the effect which this discovery had upon him is simply an impossibility.

He was stunned—overwhelmed.

A slight wound causes much pain—a deadly one causes insensibility.

So it was with the effect which this terrible discovery had upon Dick Turpin.

"I was warned of this," he murmured; "but the warning came too late. This is just as I dreamt, and I feel now just those sensations which were presented to me with such horrible distinctness in my vision. To think that it should come to this at last! I, who have so often sworn that I would never yield myself with life—yet here I wake up and find myself the inmate of a prison cell!"

Dick was so dismayed and daunted upon coming to a full realisation of his position that he could think of doing nothing.

Of one important circumstance he yet remained in ignorance.

This was, that his captors were unaware of his identity.

This was a most vital thing, and, could he but have known it, would have produced no slight amount of contentment.

It chanced, however, that he came once very near to guessing it.

He all at once made the discovery that his limbs were entirely free.

This amazed him not a little, as he naturally enough expected that the first step taken would be to load him with the heaviest irons.

Why they had omitted this precaution puzzled him to think.

The true solution never once occurred to him.

It was while in this state of indecision and uncertainty that the cell door was opened.

And now Dick observed another singularity.

This was, that the jailer had a broad grin upon his face, which looked anything but stern in its expression.

The fact was, this man felt quite sure that Dick must be a real gentleman, the grounds for his belief being the amount of valuables which had been found about him.

Not being a poor man, then, this turnkey was well enough acquainted with the mysteries of prison keeping to be aware that the proceedings of the preceding evening would be looked upon as a mere drunken frolic—such a one as it would be a world of pities if a gentleman could not have if he thought proper.

Experience had taught the jailer that there was nothing lost by being civil in such cases.

His behaviour, then, might well strike Dick with astonishment, who found himself wholly unable to account for it.

"Good morning, sir, saving your presence," he said, with an awkward attempt to be respectful. "If you would like anything particular for breakfast, it can always be had in the prison by paying for it."

Dick pressed his hot hands upon his burning, throbbing forehead.

"Head very bad, sir?" the man said, sympathisingly. "I can get you something that will do you a power of good."

"Do so—do so, and I——"

Dick thrust his hands into his pockets, and in no little consternation at finding them empty.

"Never mind the money—that will be all right; I will be back in a jiffey."

The turnkey retired, and Dick sank down upon the stone bench, feeling as though he could not possibly endure the distracting agony in his brain.

It seemed to have been increased a thousandfold by what had just taken place.

Luckily, the man was not long.

On his return he presented Dick with some foaming beverage, which he drank off at a draught without knowing what it was, and almost without tasting it.

"You'll be better now, sir," said the man, with the same deep respect; "you won't be taken before the magistrate for at least an hour, and by that time you will be pretty right. Don't mind it, sir, you will have to pay a fine—but that won't hurt you—perhaps bind you over to keep the peace—that's a mere trifle; and when it's all over just be good enough to remember me, sir—I have tried to make matters as pleasant as I could."

Dick could only reply to this by a long stare of astonishment, which, under any other circumstances, would have been truly comical.

"Ah, sir! I fancy you don't recollect anything about it. Well, so much the better. You will get off all the easier before the beak."

Dick was never more amazed.

Over and over again he asked himself whether he could be awake.

"Surely—surely," he thought, "I must be the sport of the vagaries of some wild dream—all this which seems so actual must be unreal."

"I'll tell you, if you like, what I heard," said the jailer, only too anxious to render a service in any way he could think of.

"What—what?" asked Dick, feverishly. "I am distracted! Tell me—tell me all."

Thereupon the jailer, keeping tolerably well to facts, gave a minute and circumstantial account of what had taken place.

Yet, although his account was such a full one, Dick was not able to comprehend his position properly for some time.

But eventually it dawned upon him that, impossible as it seemed, he had been arrested without those who took him prisoner guessing he was other than an intoxicated person.

Even with the help of the turnkey's narration, he was not able to recollect even one of the events stated to have taken place at the inn.

"I must have been under the influence of that maddening drug," he said, as soon as he was alone; "and it is the accursed stuff which is now causing me all this torment. The rascal who caused all this has met with his deserts, though that does not content me."

Dick Turpin ceased, for the wild and, as it seemed, well-nigh impossible idea seized upon him that he might be able to conceal his identity when examined before the magistrate.

If so, as the jailer had stated, he would escape by the payment of a fine, and he knew himself to be possessed of such an amount as made that a matter of small moment.

His heart beat wildly at this supposition, and his hopes increased in proportion to his former despair upon awaking and finding himself a captive.

The one person he had to dread was Skellum.

Should that persevering hunter of highwaymen chance to be in the Court, detection would be imminent.

It was quite likely he would be elsewhere, unless he had already received some inkling as to who the prisoner was.

Perplexed by these and kindred doubts and fears, Dick passed the time until he was aroused by the opening of the cell door.

[DICK TURPIN WRITES A LETTER TO HIS BROTHER.]

This was to summon him to appear at the Court.

"Say you know nothing about it," whispered the friendly but interested turnkey. "Be civil and sorry, and say how much you regret having swallowed so much wine."

On entering the Court, Dick glanced around him with an anxiety that he strove vainly to conceal.

So few persons were present, however, that he was able to satisfy himself that the much-dreaded Skellum was not visible.

Nor was his rapid gaze arrested by any familiar face.

Dick's name was asked, and after a momentary hesitation, he answered:

"John Palmer."

Some doubt may perhaps have been entertained as to whether this was his real name or an alias.

But if so, most assuredly no one guessed him to be the notorious highwayman Dick Turpin, whose exploits formed the theme of every tongue.

But it must be borne in mind that Dick himself had been seen very little in York, and the printed descriptions which had been circulated corresponded very slightly with his present condition.

This will be best understood by remembering that the alteration was so great as to prevent Captain Hawk from recognising him.

The charge was read over by the clerk, and listened to by Dick with an all-absorbing interest.

It needed all his self-command to retain the mastery over his features, but he succeeded admirably.

The charge, divested of all the legal jargon with which it was enveloped, was simply that of wilfully shooting a valuable bird—to wit, a game cock—and making use of such threats against the prosecutor as to put him in fear of his life.

Bearing in mind the promptings of the turnkey, Dick pleaded the influence of the excess of wine he had swallowed, and solemnly declared that he was profoundly ignorant of all the circumstances, and could not call one to his remembrance—that, however, no one was more sorry or regretted what had happened than himself, and protested that the threat was an unmeaning one.

The magistrate felt disposed to take a lenient view of the case.

He assessed the value of the game cock at ten pounds, which Dick was to pay, together with all costs and charges. A fine of five pounds was also levied for the attack upon the officers who arrested him; and, finally, he was to be bound over to keep the peace towards the prosecutor—himself in fifty pounds, and some one else in another fifty.

But for this last most unfortunate occurrence all would have gone well with Dick.

There was not as yet the faintest suspicion concerning him.

Where was Dick to find anyone who would be surety for him?

The thing was impossible.

He asked to be bound in himself for the sum amount, offering to pay the whole into the Court; but this was refused, and, as he was not able to name any person, he was removed to his cell once more.

Dick's vexation was intense—indeed, vexation is much too weak a term to express the condition of his mind.

Every moment of delay was fraught with danger to him.

To be compelled to remain in the prison until he found some one to be bound for him seemed equivalent to sentencing him to a life-long imprisonment.

But the turnkey gave Dick a hint.

"It's disagreeable, I know," he said, "to have to call upon any of your friends in such a matter, but you must positively fix upon some one to get you out of the scrape. Surely you must know some one who would do you this service?"

It was while the man was speaking these words that Dick remembered that he had a brother—at least, he believed he had, for a great many years had elapsed since he had either seen or heard from him.

Whether he would render him this service or not he could not tell, but his only chance lay in trying it.

"I will write to one friend," he said, at length. "Let me have the necessary materials. Here, take this. Rely upon it, I shall not forget to be grateful."

Dick had claimed a portion of his money, and he now slipped a couple of guineas into the man's hand.

"All right, sir," he said—"I will bring pens, ink, and paper at once."

He did so, and Dick sat down to commence.

But when about to put pen to paper such a crowd of recollections of his early days came thronging upon him that he was compelled to pause.

Memory carried him back to the time—and yet it was not to such a very distant period after all—when his hands had been altogether free from the stains of guilt.

When he remembered where he then was, and in what peril he stood of passing out of this world ignominiously, his feelings overwhelmed him, and for a time he was obliged to relinquish his task.

"Brother George," he murmured, at length, "I have had but few favours from your hands; but I cannot bring myself to believe that you will be so hard-hearted as to refuse me this—now, when you find that my life is at stake, and that a little trouble on your part will save it, I am certain you will not refuse. At any rate, I will try."

Dick then began his letter.

There was not much in it, but the few words were to the point.

He told his brother of his arrest, and the circumstances which had led to it.

He told him, too, that there was not the slightest suspicion among the authorities as to who he was, and that the finding of a surety would suffice to throw open the prison doors and make him a free man.

After that, he said, there would be no difficulty in doing what he had long decided upon, viz.: to quit England never to return to it again.

He concluded the letter by an earnest entreaty to his brother not to desert him in this the hour of extreme need.

Having sealed it, he called in the turnkey, and delivered the missive into his hands.

"Pay for the postage," said Dick, "so that there may be no delay. Here is a crown-piece; keep the change for yourself."

In a former chapter we have mentioned the disastrous consequences which followed the dispatch of this letter.

In the first place, the turnkey was not faithful to his trust.

In those days postage was a very different matter to what it is at present—being, in fact, about twenty times the amount.

The turnkey thought he might as well appropriate this trifle as not, and so the letter was posted unprepaid.

How slight and trivial a circumstance, and yet, beyond all question, it sealed Dick's fate.

The letter, on its arrival, was refused by his brother, on account of the sum demanded for the postage.

Unluckily, it happened that he had been hoaxed not long before and made to pay what was to him a serious sum for what he expected to be a letter, but which was nothing more than a piece of blank paper.

The postmark "York" showed him it was from a place where, to the best of his knowledge, he had no friends or relatives, and—though half unwillingly—he refused the missive.

He had been laughed at on the former occasion, and resolved not to be laughed at again.

That was Dick's death-warrant.

The letter was forwarded to the proper authorities in London.

By them it was opened, and the astounding discovery was made that the notorious Dick Turpin was the writer.

A messenger was despatched forthwith to seek out Skellum, if possible, but, at any rate, to take care that the prisoner was not allowed to get away.

After the letter had been sent Dick suffered a world of anxiety.

Days passed without bringing him any intelligence.

His heart grew sick.

Had there been the least chance of success he would have risked an escape.

But there was none.

It was a matter of great wonder to him that he should have remained so long undiscovered.

On the seventh day after his former examination he was summoned to attend the Court again.

CHAPTER MCXXVI.

DICK TURPIN IS RECOGNISED BY HIS OLD FOE, MR. SKELLUM.

"HAVE you had no answer?"

Dick had asked the question hundreds of times since he had despatched his letter, and the answer was always the same as that which the turnkey now returned to him.

"Nothing at all, sir. It is very strange, I think."

But on this last occasion the answer affected Dick more than ever.

"Brother George," he murmured, bending his head down sadly, "was it too much to ask you for so little when you knew my life was at stake?"

On reaching the Court he, as before, looked about him anxiously.

But his worst anticipations were relieved.

He saw no one whose countenance he could recognise.

The circumstance that so long a time had elapsed without the prisoner being able to find the requisite security had given birth, naturally enough, to some little suspicion, and he was called up now in order that some questions might be asked of him as to his antecedents.

How much Dick had to dread from any such inquiry as this we need not tell our readers.

But whatever condition his mind might have been in, his countenance remained unruffled.

In reply to the interrogations, he only stated that his name was John Palmer, that he was a native of Thaxted, in Essex, where his brother resided, and to whom he had written, but without eliciting a reply.

These answers were taken down for the purpose of having due inquiry made.

It was just as Dick was about to leave the bar that an unusual commotion and disturbance took place at the entrance of the Court.

The blood rushed back to Dick's heart.

Somehow, he felt conscious that he had been discovered.

He was not for long left in doubt upon the point.

Turning his head, he caught sight of the detested, cadaverous form of Skellum.

But surely Skellum was never seen in such a state of excitement as he was then.

That he had been making some very great exertion was manifested, for he was so breathless and trembled so with agitation that he was bereft of speech.

The first words, however, that he gasped out were:

"Seize that man!—hold him fast, everybody!—take every care or he will escape! Hold him—hold him, I say!"

He pointed while he spoke at the prisoner at the bar.

At first Dick seemed paralysed at finding his old enemy before him—the man to whom most unquestionably the loss of his faithful comrade and the death of Maud were attributable.

Then, with a sudden bound, his heart seemed to prompt him to be revenged.

Before anyone could stay him, he sprang over the front of the dock.

All thought he was about to make a desperate effort to get free, and the consequence was that the Court then presented such a scene of tumult as had never before been witnessed within its walls, and such as beggars all description.

Unfortunately, Dick fell awkwardly upon some benches, the presence of which he was not aware of; and before he could extricate himself he found at least a dozen men piled upon him.

All his struggles were futile.

Even had he been in possession of his full vigour he could scarcely have coped with so many foes.

But now, worn down and enfeebled, he absolutely stood no chance whatever.

Probably no one was more amazed at these proceedings than the magistrate, who, secure on his high seat, was the only passive spectator of the riotous scene.

It was not without great difficulty that Dick was completely overpowered.

The intense longing he had to revenge the deaths of those he held so dear lent him a temporary and fictitious strength.

It did not endure many minutes.

Busy hands manacled his wrists, while others tightly bound his ankles with a cord.

Further struggling was impossible.

Helpless as a log of wood, he was carried into the dock and placed upon a chair, for his exhaustion was now so great as to make standing an impossibility.

After this was done, the magistrate had no little difficulty in quelling the uproar; and as soon as ever anything approaching silence was obtained he settled his spectacles firmly and bent his gaze upon Mr. Skellum.

"Who are you?" he asked, sternly—"what do you mean by——"

"Your worship," interrupted Skellum, speaking rapidly, "you have need to be thankful that I arrived so opportunely. You little guessed what a desperate character stood before you—and, indeed, still stands. That he should not be recognised does not surprise me, for he is indeed strangely—wonderfully altered!"

"But who are you?" bawled the magistrate, dipping his pen very fiercely into the ink while he spoke.

"My name is Antrobus Skellum, and I am acting under the immediate instructions of the Secretary of State."

"Oh!"

From this moment the magistrate altered his demeanour.

"The prisoner before you," Skellum continued, with a vindictive look at Dick—for nothing could be more vexatious to him than finding after all his trouble he was deprived of the satisfaction of apprehending him—"has caused a world of trouble, and is guilty of more crimes than I could recount."

"Who is he?" asked the magistrate.

"Dick Turpin, the highwayman."

Had a cannon been discharged in the Court the effect could scarcely have been greater than this announcement produced.

"Good Heavens!" ejaculated the magistrate. "Can it be possible?"

"Not only possible, but perfectly true, your worship. That he should be in custody without his identity being suspected is perhaps one of the strangest events in his career."

The magistrate took off his spectacles and looked earnestly at the prisoner.

"You are quite sure of what you say, Mr. ——"

"Quite sure. Here is a letter which he wrote to his brother, asking him to come forward and be his surety for fifty pounds. The postage being unpaid, the letter was refused, and when opened at the Dead Letter Office, the discovery was made that Dick Turpin was the writer—that the man I had been searching for night and day, and straining every nerve to apprehend, was actually safe in prison!"

This was a most aggravating reflection to Skellum—in fact, he could scarcely contain himself.

And his feelings were by no means mollified when he perceived a smile upon the lips of every person in the Court.

"But I am satisfied," he continued, in an acrimonious voice—"quite satisfied at seeing him here a prisoner under any circumstances. I will answer for it he does not escape."

"What evidence do you intend to bring forward?" asked the magistrate.

"I imagine that these letters and my own oath as to his identity will be sufficient to warrant you in remanding him for a day or two."

"Oh, certainly!"

Mr. Skellum then swore very positively to the identity of the prisoner, who was then, under an unusually strong escort, removed to the strongest cell in the whole of York Castle.

The intelligence of the remarkable events which had occurred in the Court very quickly spread themselves over the whole of the city, causing an amount of popular excitement which, till then, had been unexampled.

Dick's first impulse upon finding himself alone in his cell was to give full vent to his despair.

"It is fate," he cried—"it is my fate! All proves it. Every effort I have made to get away from this accursed place has been a futile one—some strange circumstance has ever guided my footsteps back again to it. I am here, and I am doomed!"

But Dick Turpin was never one to abandon himself very long to despair.

On the present occasion he recovered much sooner than might have been expected.

"I know the worst now," he muttered. "Before this, I felt so undecided that I knew not how to act. Now there admits no doubt—I have but one course to follow; I will try it—I will strive my best, for if I fail I shall lose nothing."

Dick resolved upon his escape.

He was animated solely by that strong desire which had of late been so much before him.

But for his hope and confidence of being able to regain the spot where Maud lay so peacefully, he would have resigned himself entirely to his fate.

It is questionable, however, whether the hope of freedom would have presented itself under such circumstances to anyone save Dick Turpin.

After all the trouble the authorities had had, and with the existence of such a personal feeling as filled Skellum's breast, it was only reasonable to suppose that no precaution would be spared to keep him secure.

Indeed, to have permitted him to get free would have been a great scandal to everybody connected with the affair.

Yet, although not unmoved by these considerations, Dick never wavered in his resolve.

He would be free or die in the attempt.

And as to the latter, he would sooner perish so than fall into the hands of the hangman, as he would do inevitably if he remained.

One discovery, however, he was not long making which threatened to be a great impediment to his projected escape.

This was that his weakness was so great that he could scarcely move.

Such a thing as this might well have cast him into despair.

But it did not.

"Let me think," he muttered. "Some time must elapse before—before my trial—say my trial."

The word which had first risen to his lips was "execution," but he could not bring himself to pronounce that word.

"Between now and then, if I take proper measures, surely it will be easy enough for me to recover at least a considerable portion of my expended strength. Yes, yes—I will turn the whole of my attention to doing this, and, moreover, I shall have plenty of time to think over and mature my plans."

There was another thought which struck him too, and which went far towards convincing him that this enforced delay was also most vital to success.

It was only reasonable to think that a much closer and vigilant watch would be kept at first than there would be when they had found, after several nights, their watching was of no avail.

"Yes," he said, "there can be no room for doubt upon the point. I will feign that I am so impressed with the idea that my fate is inevitable that I shall make no effort. I can do that easily; I will throw them quite off their guard."

After the discovery of his identity, Dick had been removed to another and stronger part of the castle, so that for this reason he saw no more of the turnkey who had so thoughtlessly precipitated his recognition.

But he found no difficulty in obtaining a further supply of the money which had been taken from him on his first arrival at the castle, for, as is well known, the usages of prisons in this respect were widely different to what they are at the present day.

At the time of which we write, if a prisoner happened to possess a tolerably good store of cash, confinement in his cell was about the only discomfort he had to endure, and even this was made as light as possible.

Scarcely any restriction was made as to the kinds of provisions and drink that were carried in, and Dick availed himself of this state of things to have brought to him every nourishing kind of food and wine he could think of.

He had to pay for them most extravagantly, it is true, but then he did not care for that—nothing could have caused him less consideration.

He was pleased to find that he was gaining flesh and strength daily in the most surprising manner.

Indeed, when he was had up for his next examination he presented something like his former aspect.

He had not troubled himself to inquire the precise nature of the charge that was to be brought forward against him on this occasion.

Nor had he thought it worth while to engage any legal assistance.

The money paid to any lawyer would have been simply thrown away, for no man, though never so eloquent, could have brought the trial to end in the least degree to his advantage.

All that was gone through was a form merely.

Yet, when the details were made known to him, he could not help feeling some degree of surprise.

"Your worship," said the counsel for the prosecution, "the charge I am about to bring before the prisoner is of the most serious nature known—it is that of murder!"

Dick listened eagerly, for at present he could not think of what was coming.

"I fixed upon this charge," continued the counsel, "because if proved—and no evidence can be clearer than that which I possess—it will be sufficient to warrant the passing of sentence of death, and because it is one of the last of the long list of crimes the prisoner has committed."

Even after this preface it did not strike Dick what was coming.

"It appears that only so lately as the 18th inst. the prisoner was in the environs of York. Stopping at a small public-house, he, with many threats and curses, bade the ostler place a horse at his service, and offering a very considerable sum in return if he would do so. This the honest fellow very properly refused to do, whereupon the prisoner, with a loud oath whipped out his sword and wounded the ostler therewith so grievously that in a short time he died from the effects.

"But not without leaving some testamentary evidence behind.

"Most fortunately the poor fellow survived long enough to serve the ends of justice. Here is his statement of what took place, written down from his lips, and attested by reliable evidence."

The document in question was handed to the magistrate.

Glancing over it, his eyes rested upon the signatures.

"Call John Timmis," he said, in a loud voice.

A portly, jovial-looking man responded to the summons.

He was placed in the witness-box at once.

The magistrate read over the document, which was to the effect of what we have just stated.

"Is that correct?" he asked.

"Every word of it, your worship."

"How did you discover what had happened?"

"We heard a most awful groaning, your worship; and on going to see what was the cause of it, we saw the ostler lying on his back in the stable weltering in his blood."

"Very good. And after he had made this statement, what did he do?"

"Went dead, your worship."

It is not our purpose, however, to enter minutely into the proceedings which took place on this occasion.

The officers who had chased him over the house-tops were examined.

To them Dick's disappearance was as great a mystery as ever.

Then others were produced who testified to having seen Dick walking away from the scene of the murder on the evening in question, and not long after the hour when it must have been committed.

Then Skellum came forward, and swore most positively that the prisoner at the bar was no other than the world-renowned highwayman, Dick Turpin.

"Prisoner at the bar," said the magistrate, "what have you to say?"

"I have nothing to say."

"Do you plead guilty or not guilty?"

"Not guilty."

After this Dick Turpin was duly committed to take his trial at the next York assizes, on the charge of wilful murder.

The magistrate thought fit to caution the Governor of the prison to take every possible precaution to prevent the escape of the daring offender he had entrusted to his custody.

Dick merely bowed as he left the Court.

"He seems remarkably quiet," said the magistrate to Skellum, in a confidential whisper. "I thought he was such a desperate character."

"So he is."

"How do you account for his present behaviour?"

"I cannot account for it, your worship," was Skellum's reply; "but feeling convinced that it means something, I shall keep a doubly sharp look-out."

"Are you sure you have got the right man?"

"As sure as I am of my own identity."

"That is sufficient, then."

Outside the Court nothing was talked of but the particulars of Dick's extraordinary arrest; but, strangely enough, it happened that Captain Hawk was the last to hear anything about it.

CHAPTER MCXXVII

DICK TURPIN HAS A MOST UNEXPECTED YET MOST WELCOME VISITOR.

From the day when the good old castle of York had first been put to the base uses of a prison never had there been so much excitement in and around its walls as there was when they had Dick Turpin for a prisoner.

Double guards were placed in all the corridors, and relieved at frequent intervals, while many men were set to patrol the outward walls.

Of all this Skellum was the presiding genius—he was indefatigable.

But this will seem by no means wonderful when it is remembered how much he had at stake.

Dick still preserved that calm, apathetic behaviour which had so surprised the magistrate and caused Mr. Skellum to be more suspicious than ever.

But the prisoner's composure was severely tried by the number of visitors who crowded the cell for the purpose of visiting him.

Of these, nearly all were perfect strangers, brought solely by a contemptible curiosity.

There was not one of them who would have aided him in any way, yet they would stand gaping at him and endeavouring to enter into conversation with him in a manner that would lead one to suppose that they were deeply interested in his fate.

It was in vain that Dick protested against this.

No regard was paid to his complaints.

He was looked upon more in the light of a wild beast than an ordinary mortal, and therefore it was no more than right that he should be gazed at.

But among the rest came the warm-hearted baronet, Sir Humphrey Yeomans.

Dick's face lighted up with pleasure as soon as he beheld him, for he knew his motive to be a better one than mere curiosity.

"I am truly sorry to see you here," were Sir Humphrey's first words. "When I heard you had tricked the officers at the lawyer's, I was in the hopes that you would get clear away."

"And unquestionably I should have succeeded in doing this had it not been for the basest treachery," said Dick, with a bitterness which he could not suppress. "But, there," he added, "it's no good grieving over the past."

"Not a bit of it—not a bit of it. I am glad you think so. What brings me here, however, is to know what I can do in your behalf."

"You are too generous, and I——"

"Pooh, pooh!—nothing of the sort. If what you have done for me does not deserve a return, I should like to know what does. Don't be afraid to speak, but just say what I can do for you."

"I am afraid nothing, though I thank you just the same."

"But I insist upon doing something, if it is ever so little; I sha'n't rest if I don't do something."

"I wish I knew some way in which you could aid me," answered Dick; "but I do not. I am here, and I know my position well enough to feel certain that the authorities will only allow me to leave here when on my way to the scaffold."

"Pooh, pooh, I say! You don't know what can be done in England when money is in the case, and I sha'n't be inclined to spare a few pounds, I assure you."

"And yet, Sir Humphrey, I trust you will forgive me for saying that I am afraid money will be but of slight importance in my case."

"I shall not allow you to be a judge, and that puts into my head what will be the best thing I can do for you. It is to send the lawyers to you; they will know best what can be done."

This offer Dick could not reject.

He had but little hope that it would eventuate to his benefit, but for all that he thanked Sir Humphrey warmly, because he knew how well-intentioned the offer was.

"Put every trust in Steel," he said, when about to depart. "He is a wonderfully clever fellow; and if anybody can do the least good he can."

Again expressing his thanks as well as he was able—for true gratitude is ever poor in thanks—Dick Turpin bade the eccentric baronet farewell.

But another visitor came that same day, whose presence was, if anything, more pleasing to Dick than the baronet's had been, and that is saying a great deal.

Just when the cell was beginning to grow dusky and obscure from the decline of daylight, the cell door was opened, and a form which Turpin at first did not recognise crossed the threshold.

This was a young man of very juvenile appearance—but this was principally owing to the fact that there was only just the faintest possible moustache visible on his upper lip.

His cheeks and chin were as smooth and velvety as those of a woman.

His hands, too, were white, small and delicate—of a very feminine appearance.

He was attired in the very extreme of the then prevailing fashion—in fact, a dandified-looking individual of the Beau Brummel type.

In one hand he carried a perfume-box with a perforated lid, which he applied to his nose continually.

"Disgusting odour!" he exclaimed, advancing with the finikin step of a dancing master. "Odious—odious! Where's Dick Turpin? Hi! you key-carrier—which is Dick Turpin? Ah!"

Having concluded this brilliant speech, he took a particularly long sniff at his perfume-box.

The turnkey manifested the utmost respect and deference towards this foppish individual, though he had to draw the back of his hand across his lips to conceal the grin which appeared there.

From his manner, however, it was clear that the fresh visitor had behaved liberally to him.

"There he is, if you please, sir," the turnkey answered. "He is quite harmless. You can go as close as you like to him without danger—he is securely chained."

"Ah! is it so? Positively—demme!"

He screwed his eye-glass into his eye as he spoke, and stared for some moments in silence.

There was an angry glare visible in Dick's eyes.

This young fellow's manner was, as may be supposed, most offensive to him.

"Monstrous—monstrous strange!" he ejaculated, dropping his eye-glass and again having recourse to his pounce-box. "A curiosity—a wonder! Ah! demme!"

Another long stare followed.

Then turning to the jailer, he said:

"Here, you key-carrier, take this—it's a guinea. Get something to drink outside—I want to talk a little with this Turpin. Ah! I profess he's a curiosity—yes, a monstrous curiosity! Ah, ah!"

The turnkey took the coin slipped into his hand, and withdrew without a word, closing the door after him.

No sooner had he retired than a remarkable alteration took place in the manner of this very affected creature.

With a sudden stride that was surprisingly at variance with his former movements, he placed himself quite close to the prisoner and held out his hand.

"Why, Dick, my friend," he said, in a suppressed voice, and with such a striking difference in its tones—"is it possible that my disguise is so good as to prevent you from recognising me? or is it the darkness of this detestable place? I——"

"Beg, pardon, sir," said the turnkey, opening the door with such suddenness as to cause the visitor to start and appear in no slight degree disconcerted; "I forgot to say that when you wanted to leave all you have to do is to tap against the door here. I shall hear you."

"Very well, key-carrier — very well," replied the stranger, only partially succeeding in his attempt to resume his former voice and manner.

The turnkey, however, seemed to suspect nothing, for he withdrew again without uttering another syllable.

"Confound the fellow!" said the stranger, speaking in what we may suppose to be his natural voice; "he scared me for the moment."

Dick looked puzzled for a moment.

"My disguise is good," said the stranger. "But look; surely you will recognise me now."

He stood so that what light struggled through the window of the cell fell upon his face.

"Captain Hawk!" ejaculated Dick.

"Hush—hush; not so loud! That confounded fellow might have ears long enough to hear what you say, and that would be decidedly unpleasant."

"This is indeed a pleasure and a satisfaction!" Dick cried, with sparkling eyes, and clasping the young man's outstretched hand. "But why are you here?"

"To see you."

"Is that all?"

"All, do you call it? Is it not more than enough? I look upon it as a slight favour to show to one whom I like to consider a comrade and a friend."

"You are very generous."

"Not a bit of it. I have come here to see you and to serve you, Dick; and as I have done the one, so will I accomplish the other."

There could be no mistaking the tone of resolution in which the captain spoke.

His manner was that of a man who is determined effect some object, no matter what obstacles or difficulties stand in the way."

The way in which he spoke had a great effect upon Dick Turpin.

He had a high opinion of the captain.

He knew him to be one to rush on where all others would shrink back or pause, and Dick had found by experience how often this line of action ensures success in any desperate undertaking.

And what could be too desperate for Captain Hawk?

"I am truly sorry to see you here, Dick," he said; "but there is one comfort even in that."

"How so?"

"We know the worst."

Dick smiled.

"You shall be free."

"I hope so."

"I say it, and mean it. You shall be free, if you have to step over my dead body to make your escape!"

Oh, how grateful it was to Dick to find such a friend as this so unexpectedly, and after what had so lately taken place!

His emotions overcame him to such an extent, that speech was impossible.

But Captain Hawk went on speaking with the same energy and rapidity of utterance as before.

"I hold it as a point of the nicest honour to set you free; so rest assured I shall not fail, for I consider I am to a great extent the cause of your being here now—I am more than anybody else to blame for it, and to my last day I shall never cease to regret the circumstance."

These words were in the highest degree enigmatical to Dick.

He looked up with an air of puzzled wonder.

"You to blame!" he murmured. "I don't understand you. What do you mean?"

"Neither more nor less than I say."

"But explain."

"Why, when you were struggling with the police before your capture, I was close at hand—I rode up just as you were overpowered."

"You did?" ejaculated Dick, in the utmost astonishment.

"I did. And I know you want to ask the question why it was I did not at the least make some attempt to save you."

"Nay, I——"

"But I know you do; and what is more, I know that is what I ought to have done. But incredible as it may seem to you, though I saw you with tolerable plainness, I did not recognise you."

"Not recognise me!" echoed Dick, in a way which showed how much this had surprised him.

"No, I positively did not; and if you could only contrive to form some idea of how you looked on that occasion, your astonishment would cease. You were bruised and bleeding, your apparel was covered with dust, and such a change had been wrought in your features that they were perfectly strange to me."

"It must have been so," responded Dick, somewhat sadly, "otherwise the officers would have known me."

"True."

"And were not you recognised?"

"Well, I was; and, to tell the truth, I was not prepared for the event, and was thrown for a moment off my guard. My immediate impulse, without the least reflection, mind you, was to touch Satan a little, and then the next thing I knew anything about was that we were flying over the open country like the wind."

Dick sighed heavily, for these words reminded him forcibly of his great and irreparable loss.

Captain Hawk did not fail to perceive the effect his words had had, and, with a right instinct, he forebore from asking any questions about Black Bess—a thing he was most anxious to do.

"What causes me the most remorse," he went on, "is the conviction I feel that I could, had I but known, have rescued you from your captors; and that is why I so blame myself, and why I consider I am the cause of your being here."

"But it is wrong on your part to think so."

"Don't try to persuade me of that; it would be a hopeless task, I assure you. I do blame myself, and I am resolved to make what reparation I am able. You shall be free, Dick, and by my agency, even if I have to pull down every stone of York Castle to accomplish it."

Dick smiled at the enthusiasm he manifested.

"Wait a moment," he said; "you must explain your presence here. It is a perfect mystery how you contrived to gain admittance."

"Nothing could be more simple."

"How so?"

"You see this disguise? I play my part tolerably well, do I not?"

"Exceedingly well."

"Such a character is easy enough to play, and that is why I selected it. When my make-up was perfect, I called upon Sir Humphrey Yeomans, and after a little difficulty, got him to write an order for my admittance."

"But you expose yourself to great danger by coming here."

"Not a bit of it. The police are such dunder-headed fellows that you have only got to travel a little out of the beaten track and they are puzzled completely. But never mind that—let us come back to the matter in hand."

"My escape?"

"Just so."

"A very close watch is being kept round the prison, is there not?"

"Yes, very, and I am glad to see it."

"Glad to see it?"

"Yes; the very superfluity of precaution will undo itself. In a night or so, if all is kept quiet, they will grow as careless as possible. These violent measures never last."

"I believe you are right," answered Dick, speaking in a tone of voice which showed that Captain Hawk's words had produced a marked effect upon his spirits.

"Of course I am right; and only consider how easy it would have been for me to supply you with a tool or two on this present visit. But it is not worth while to regret that; we have time enough before us. There is, however, one very important thing."

"What is it?"

"Why, that you try your best to recover your customary strength."

"Rely upon it, I shall do so."

"That is right, then. The rest leave to me; I will take care in a short time to supply you with all things necessary for a successful escape, as well as give you all possible information."

"You are indeed a true friend," exclaimed Dick, enthusiastically, and grasping the young man's hand while he spoke. "Until you came my heart was sad and heavy, for I believed I had no friend; now, however, I feel relieved of a heavier load than I can possibly describe."

"Believe me, I rejoice to hear it; and when your escape has been effected I will aid you to do anything you may decide upon."

Dick was most grateful for this assurance.

Some more conversation passed between them, but it is not necessary to place it before our readers, because it only related to those events that had elapsed, and about which Captain Hawk possessed no very definite information.

"I must put an end to this visit now," he said, at length; "though I am most reluctant to leave you; still, I have stayed long enough already to give rise to suspicion, and it is impossible to be too cautious and too prudent."

Dick could not but admit the force and truth of this, though the prospect of a separation affected him strangely. His feelings can only be understood by those who have been cut off from all communication from their fellow-beings, and whose hearts have yearned for the companionship of some congenial spirit.

Agreeably to the intimation of the turnkey, Captain Hawk tapped upon the panel of the door.

It was opened with so much promptness that he rejoiced to think the whole of the conversation between himself and his friend had been prudently carried on in a low tone.

CHAPTER MCXXVIII.

ALLOWS THE READER TO TAKE A PEEP AT THE REMARKABLE PROCEEDINGS OF CAPTAIN HAWK.

Laughing in his sleeve at the short-sightedness of the authorities, Captain Hawk made his way out of the prison unmolested.

The idea never once entered the minds of the men on duty that this superfinical-looking personage was other than he appeared to be.

On emerging into the streets, the captain was surprised to find it was so dark.

In fact, night had fairly set in.

"Let me see," he said, walking with more briskness than was exactly consonant with his assumed character—"I have much to do—very much. It is plain that Dick relies upon me—perhaps the reason is that he has no one else. No matter, I shall succeed; his reliance will not prove to be ill-placed."

When he spoke again an additional seriousness might have been detected in the tones of his voice.

"It is most certain," he said, "that this enterprise cannot be carried on without money, and it is equally certain that I have not enough at the present moment. The conclusion that follows is plain enough: the money must be had, though my intention was to keep myself perfectly quiet; but that is out of the question now."

At this moment he turned a corner, and found himself close to an old inn—probably one of the oldest and most picturesque-looking habitations in the whole City of York.

Some faded gilt letters on a weather-beaten sign-board informed wayfarers that the old inn was known by the sign of The Chequers.

It was evident that the place did not lack custom, for loud sounds of rude and boisterous merriment issued from its many doors and windows.

Captain Hawk gave a hasty glance around him.

It was the first time he had done so since he left the castle, so that for aught he knew he might have been followed the whole of the way.

Nothing was visible, however, that would cause apprehension.

Having satisfied himself that the coast was clear, he somewhat suddenly plunged into the shadow of a wide, dark gateway communicating with the stables.

It was towards the latter that his steps were directed.

His approach was either seen or heard, for a door was opened and an ostler appeared, whose face was beaming all over with a grin of satisfaction.

"My eyes, captain," he ejaculated, with evident satisfaction, "how first-rate you do look, to be sure—capital!"

Captain Hawk neither paused nor spoke until he had crossed the threshold.

Then his first words were:

"Is Satan all right?"

"Never was better, captain—never better, I'll take upon myself to say that; but do tell me, how ever was it that you came to give him such a name?"

"Because he has power over the darkness."

"Now, that's what I call a good answer, captain—the best I have heard for many a day."

The captain did not seem inclined to take the ostler's word, for he penetrated still further into the stables until he reached the stall where his matchless steed was standing.

A low whinnying sound showed that he was recognised, and it was with a thrill of his nerves and a glow of his heart which cannot be described the captain fondly caressed his horse.

"You are in good trim," he said. "It would be almost a pity to let you stand still. Sam!"

"Yes, captain."

"Get Satan ready for me as quickly as you can. I will just go in and make a few necessary changes in my dress."

"It's a pity, captain—a real pity. Those togs suit you exactly."

Hawk smiled, but said nothing.

Emerging from the stable, he crossed the yard and entered the inn by a small door which did not seem to be much used as a means of entrance.

The passage beyond was very dark, but the captain must have been wonderfully well acquainted with it, for he walked on with the utmost confidence.

At the extremity was a door.

Opening this, he passed into a small apartment dimly lighted by a smouldering fire.

A good kick with his foot caused the logs to break into a blaze.

The flickering light which now shot up showed that the room was by no means destitute of comforts.

On the table a light repast was spread, evidently in anticipation of the captain's coming.

The whole had a most tempting look, and as he glanced at the different viands he pronounced the name:

"Jessie!"

By this he most likely meant that he knew to whom he was indebted for this attention; and by the smile on his lips and the sparkle in his eyes, it might be inferred that this mention of her name conjured up most agreeable recollections.

But he was in too much hurry and excitement to do anything like justice to the delicacies laid before him.

A few minutes sufficed to enable him to make the necessary alterations in his costume.

Advancing to the door, he took down a large horseman's cloak that was hanging behind it, and just as he did so a faint tapping sound came from without.

Captain Hawk opened the door in a moment.

A young girl, whose age at the most could not have exceeded seventeen, just crossed the threshold, and stood in an attitude of mingled timidity and grace.

Her large, dark eyes were fixed in a moment upon the captain's face with a glance that was expressive of pleasure and half reproach.

"Shall you go out again to-night?" she asked, in a sweet, musical voice.

"Yes, Jessie; I am off now. In another moment I should have been gone."

"Without a word?"

"You might have been unaware of my brief return. But never mind, my lass; I shall be back in a few hours after midnight."

The young girl sighed faintly, and turned away, perhaps to hide the tears that sprang up to her eyes.

"Au revoir, Jessie!" cried the highwayman, with careless gaiety. "Don't be uneasy; I shall soon return."

And with these words on his lips, he flung the cloak over his shoulder, and left the room.

Not once did he glance back, and when he again emerged into the inn yard he was whistling in an undertone a portion of a popular air from the last new opera.

Satan was quite ready.

Seeing the captain approach, the ostler led the horse into the yard.

After a careful inspection of all the trappings, the captain vaulted into the saddle.

"Keep a good look-out for my return, Sam," he said. "I can't say when it will be—most likely the moment when you least expect me."

He slightly slackened the rein as he spoke.

Satan had already been chafing at the delay in starting, and bounded off at once.

As he rode thus swiftly out of the inn yard, the captain fancied he caught sight of a pale, anxious-looking face watching his departure.

"Poor Jessie!" he muttered. "She is a good lass, but——"

He left the thought unuttered.

The Old Chequers Inn stood quite on the outskirts of the City of York, and therefore a very short time indeed elapsed before Captain Hawk had the open country before him.

As soon as this was the case he loosed the reins, and allowed the horse to go at his own pace.

This was something tremendous.

Trees, hedgerows, solitary houses, and other wayside objects flitted past like swift-fleeting shadows.

A wild enthusiasm took possession of the highwayman's mind as he experienced the exhilaration produced by rapid motion.

Away—away—on and on, further and further still, until Satan's mouth became filled with white flakes of foam.

Presently the captain gently drew the rein.

By slow degrees, Satan's speed was lessened, until it was reduced to an easy trot.

"Surely this is far enough from York," said Captain Hawk. "It's a dozen miles at least from here to the Old Chequers, and so I don't care how soon something comes in the way."

Stopping his horse altogether—for he had reached a spot that seemed most favourable for his purpose—the highwayman proceeded to make a deliberate and careful examination of his weapons.

One he paid especial attention to.

This was a pistol.

It was altogether a remarkable weapon.

The barrel was of unusual length, and glittered like polished silver.

The butt had nothing pistol-like about it, being, in fact, more suggestive of the handle of a carpenter's saw.

This gave it an odd appearance.

But, as might be seen, this was the captain's favourite weapon, strange and peculiar as it might look.

The strangest thing in connection with it was, that the highwayman addressed it just as he would a living creature.

It had a name—

A most significant name—

Death!

By this appellation the highwayman not only spoke of but to it.

"There, Death," he exclaimed, putting the pistol in his belt in such a way that he felt would enable him to seize it in an instant, "I am ready now for anything that may betide! You are my truest friend, for I never knew you to fail me in the hour of need."

Although made as plainly, perhaps, as any firearm could be—we mean with regard to the chased mountings which are usually seen upon such things—yet it would have been hard to match it with one more beautifully finished in every part.

The lock was everything that it was supposed possible for a lock to be in those days, when nipples and percussion caps were undreamt of.

The peculiar formation of the handle is worthy of consideration even in these days, when it hardly seems possible to bring firearms any closer to perfection.

The saw-like shape we have described, however, had many advantages, which showed it to be far superior to the stock in common use.

It was expressly framed to suit the grasp of the captain's hand—the shape permitted a firm hold to be taken in a moment.

Nor was this all.

The butt being grooved so as to receive each finger separately enabled the weapon to be held with remarkable steadiness, and that tendency to pull upwards that exists in every pistol as now made was completely done away with.

Captain Hawk could take an instant steady and true aim with it, and as the lock was good, and he paid particular attention to the loading, it was rarely indeed, if ever, that he failed to hit the mark with it.

He always relied upon it for use in that emergency when a shot would get him out of his difficulty.

He listened intently for some moments after the examination of his pistols, but no sound indicating the approach of a traveller was borne to his ears.

"The road is strangely deserted," he muttered; "but I must exercise my patience a little. Perhaps, when they do begin to come, they will follow quickly."

He prepared to wait.

But Captain Hawk happened to be one of those individuals who find it impossible to remain still for any length of time.

Even during the few moments he did remain immovable his brain was busily at work.

"That's a good idea," he broke out, all at once—"a very good idea. I've a good mind to try it. I should be saved a world of trouble, I daresay."

Again Captain Hawk listened.

But the highway remained as silent as before.

This decided him.

He at once set about the execution of his idea.

What its nature was will be very quickly seen by his actions.

First of all he dismounted, and leaving his horse to wander whither he pleased, for he knew he could recall him in an instant when he wished to do so, he went towards the side of the road.

By his manner it was clear he was looking for something.

He walked on for a few yards, and stopped at a gate that led into a meadow.

Glancing across the road, he was just able to make out there was a similar gate as nearly as possible opposite to him.

"The very thing," he cried—"nothing could be better!"

The gate close to which he stood was only fastened by means of a piece of chain wrapped round the post; consequently, it was easy enough to open it.

This was his next proceeding.

He pulled at the gate until it was at right angles to the road, and then by means of a couple of large stones lying hard by he contrived to fix it in this position.

Then crossing over, he treated the opposite gate in just the same way.

From this it will be seen he had, with very little expenditure of time and trouble, erected a barrier that blocked up two-thirds of the high-road.

"A couple of good hurdles now, if I could only find them, would finish the job nicely," he said, surveying what he had already accomplished with great satisfaction.

In the country it was not likely he would have to look far without finding some hurdles.

He found some close at hand, and quickly selected two which he judged just fitting to his purpose.

The barrier, though now complete—that is to say, stretching continuously from one side of the highway to the other—was by no means strong.

Indeed, very little would suffice to bear it down.

But it was strong enough to answer Captain Hawk's purpose, especially when he had fortified it by means of a few more of the large stones, of which plenty were lying about.

"There," he exclaimed, "I am ready now, and travellers may come just as soon as they think proper—they will find me prepared. Hi, Satan! here, boy, here!"

He did not raise his voice much.

But the faithful animal heard it.

Faithfully and readily, as some well-trained dog might do, the horse trotted to his side.

Mounting was by no means a lengthy or laborious action for Captain Hawk to accomplish.

He seemed to give but one spring from the ground and then to be firmly fixed in his seat.

"Ah!" he exclaimed, as he thrust his right foot carelessly into the stirrup, "just in the very nick of time! Now, I call this providential. How very kind to wait till I had finished!"

It was the unmistakable sound produced by the approach of some vehicle which had brought these words to his lips.

And in the easiest manner possible to conceive, as though it was the best sport imaginable, he held himself in readiness for action.

"Drawn by one horse, running on two wheels, and on the road to York," were the comments made by the captain.

He was quite right.

In less than a moment he caught sight of two star-like looking lights in the distance.

They rapidly approached, and ere long he was able to distinguish the upper portion of the horse that was harnessed to the gig, and, very dimly, the forms of two persons sitting in it.

The horse was coming on at a round trot, and so great was the silence that the captain could hear the murmur of conversation.

The speakers must have been interested in what they were saying or they would have seen the barrier before them sooner than they did; but perhaps one reason for this was, that knowing the roadway to be perfectly clear in this part they did not trouble themselves to keep a good look-out.

CHAPTER MCXXIX.

CONTINUES TO RELATE THE REMARKABLE PROCEEDINGS OF CAPTAIN HAWK.

THE horse, however, showed himself to be far more prudent and sagacious.

Seeing something in his path, he resolutely came to a stop, planting his fore feet upon the roadway in a manner which seemed suggestive of his determination to go no further.

The stoppage aroused the people in the vehicle.

The lamps at the side enabled them to see in a moment

[THE FATE OF ANTROBUS SKELLUM.]

that some strange-looking barricade had been stretched across the road.

The discovery was accompanied by a shrill scream.

"Oh, Alfred," said a female voice, "we are lost and undone! We shall be robbed, I am sure we shall!"

"And if we are, whose fault will it be?" was the rough rejoinder of her companion. "It was you who would insist upon travelling to-night, instead of waiting till morning, as I wanted to do."

"Oh, you mean, pitiful wretch—you base, base-hearted villain! Perhaps you think I did not see through your pretty little plan? I have got eyes in my head, I rather think! I know what you wanted to stop for! Fine doings, indeed!"

"Don't make a fool of yourself," growled her husband, "but just take hold of the reins while I jump down and see what this is in front! Dash me, if I can make it out!"

The lady screamed again.

This time with thrice as much shrillness.

Dimly and imperfectly she had caught sight of the form of Captain Hawk.

"Oh, mercy! Help!" she shrieked. "Here he is—a highwayman! I knew we were going to be robbed!"

"Robbed!" ejaculated the captain, in a deep voice. "I hope you will not shock me by pronouncing such a word while I am by."

"Oh, goodness!"

Captain Hawk came still nearer.

He was careful, however, to keep as much out of the direct rays of the lamp as possible.

"Who are you, sir?" asked the man in the gig, with a great assumption of fierceness and valour—"who are you, I should like to know?"

"A gentleman."

"I am glad to hear it—I took you for a——"

No. 253 will be Published next Monday.

Hold your row, will you!" cried his wife. "You're not fit to be allowed to open your mouth! Do you want to insult the gentleman?"

"Certainly not; but I should be glad if he would tell us what it is that stops the way.'

"A private gate," replied Captain Hawk, with the utmost gravity.

'A private gate! What on earth do you mean by that?"

"Just what I say."

"But this is a public road, and perfectly free to anyone who may choose to travel along it. No one can put up a private gate on the highway."

"There you are quite wrong," said the captain, "for, as you see, here it is."

"But what is it for?"

"My own convenience."

The travellers were bewildered.

What to make of the captain they knew not.

Certainly his manners were not those of a common robber.

Whether they had anything to fear from him or not they could not decide.

He seemed quite at his ease, and not in the least hurry or confusion.

"Your own convenience, sir!" said the lady, at length, perceiving her companion seemed too astonished to continue the conversation. "Excuse me, sir, but I do not understand you."

"A few words will make all quite clear," returned the captain, with a great affectation of politeness.

"Indeed sir!"

"Yes, I am here to collect subscriptions for a charitable and truly praiseworthy object; but, as I am sorry to say, there are some people in the world so void of principle that they would shuffle out of such a matter. I have been compelled to set up this temporary obstruction."

"In other words," growled the man, "you have stopped up the road simply in order that you may rob us with greater ease and convenience to yourself."

"Really, sir," returned the captain, "I am truly surprised that so respectable a man as you appear to be should make use of such a disreputable word. Rob! Bah! I can't bear the idea of anything so mean and vulgar."

"Good!" said the traveller. "I rather like that, I confess. Rob, forsooth! What have you in your hand now, I should like to know? Why don't you call a spade a spade?"

"What a fool you must be," broke in his better half, "to insult the gentleman in that fashion!"

"Gentleman be d—d! He is a fine gentleman!"

"Such language," said Captain Hawk, professing the utmost disgust, "is horrible—truly horrible! I hope I shall hear no more of it, but that you will pay attention to what I am going to say."

"Speak on, sir—speak on, sir," said the lady. "We shall be glad to listen."

"Thank you," answered Hawk, with a bow. "As I said, I am here to-night to receive subscriptions for a praiseworthy object. Those who are wise contribute liberally, and are allowed to ride on without further molestation; while those who refuse, compel me to make use of arguments."

The wife nudged her husband.

"Give him something," she said, "and perhaps he will allow us to go on."

The captain's ears were quick enough to catch the import of what was said, and he replied, instantly:

"Certainly; there will be no further obstruction; but, understand me, if you offer any unworthy sum I shall resent it as an insult."

"And may I ask the object of this contribution?"

"Yes, certainly."

"Be good enough to inform me, then."

"One of my best friends happens to be in an unfortunate situation, from which he may be relieved by money."

"I suppose some rascally comrade of yours is in jail?"

"If you will insist on representing facts in such a vulgar way," said the captain, "why, I must admit you are right."

"I never heard of anything so cool in my life! D—n me, sir! I could laugh; but—but you are carrying the joke a little too far. You would ask me for money, and what you intend to do with it is to help the escape of one of your associates from prison!"

"It's no joke at all."

"Why, if I gave you a farthing for such a purpose," continued the traveller, "I should be neither more nor less than an accessory before the fact."

"Before or behind is all one to me," returned Hawk "I mean to have your contribution notwithstanding."

"What if I refuse compliance with your demand?"

"You had better not do so."

"But suppose I do?"

"I should be compelled to have recourse to arguments."

As he spoke, the highwayman drew forth a pistol and cocked it with an audible click.

The sound was one which jarred upon the ears of the travellers.

The lady screamed.

Her husband uttered an angry curse.

"I have your folly to thank for this!" he muttered wrathfully. "But it serves me right for not acting according to my own judgment. I hate to ride in the dark, and I will never do it again."

"Come, sir," said Hawk, "I have no more time to spare. Hand over!"

"What do you want?"

"As much as you like. Take care how you offer me too little—the consequence you will find to be rather serious. Be reasonable, and you will be allowed to ride on."

"Unreasonable, you mean."

"Just as you please," returned the captain, as imperturbably as ever.

Such a manner was, to say the least of it, intensely aggravating.

The traveller doubtless thought to behave in a liberal manner, for he opened a small leather bag and took from it several gold pieces.

"I beg your pardon," said Captain Hawk—"I ought to have told you that I make it part of my system never to take loose money. Be good enough to hand me the bag just as it is. Thank you!"

While he spoke, the captain outstretched his arm and took hold of the bag.

The traveller was so amazed at this last speech that for a second or two he could do nothing but stare.

When he recovered himself the bag was gone.

It had found a secure resting-place at the bottom of one of the highwayman's pockets.

"You may pass on now," he said. "The contribution is sufficient. Many thanks! Good night!"

He removed the hurdles as he spoke.

The traveller seemed at first inclined to protest against this appropriation of his money.

Most likely, however, he remembered the captain's pistol, and consequently altered his mind.

Seizing hold of the whip, he gave the horse so smart a cut with it that the poor beast snorted with pain, and set off at a highly dangerous pace.

Rapid as it was, yet, nevertheless, Captain Hawk caught a few words which the traveller addressed to his wife that seemed to indicate that he would visit his annoyance and vexation upon her.

This, as the reader may suppose, occasioned the captain but little uneasiness.

The bag, though small, was weighty, and, as it appeared to him, contained nothing but gold.

If so, the amount would be considerable.

Too careless, however, to take the trouble to ascertain this, Captain Hawk set to work to restore his barrier to its former condition.

"Upon my word," he said, "this is a capital plan. I can't imagine how it is I never thought of it before."

He had barely time to finish making his preparations when his acute sense of hearing informed him that there were more travellers upon the road.

"Just in time," he muttered, as he regained his place upon Satan's back. "I hope I may be as fortunate this time."

The sounds were less equivocal.

The captain was able to pronounce with certainty upon what was coming.

"Two horsemen," he murmured, "and coming from York. If my late friends gave them a hint of what is in store for them, I may have some trouble. But what does it matter?"

He hummed a few lines from one of the most popular airs, and prepared himself for business.

The horsemen came on rapidly—so rapidly that the captain began to think they could have no suspicion of the existence of the barrier across the roadway.

Nor had they light of any kind to make it visible.

"They have no suspicions," murmured Hawk, getting a pistol ready for use; "and yet one would have thought that that man, having been robbed himself, would have been generous enough to put others on their guard against suffering a like loss. But no—no; that would not be in accordance with human nature."

The highwayman was right there.

It would be a satisfaction to the late traveller, beyond a doubt, when he saw that others were in a fair way of falling into the snare.

"Hullo!" said one of the new-comers, suddenly, for his horse stopped all at once, almost unseating him in doing so; "what the devil is the matter?"

His companion happened to be a pace or two behind him, and drew the rein.

"The matter?" he asked. "Where? What do you mean?"

"There's something in the road."

"What is it?"

"That's what I can't make out."

Up to this moment, Captain Hawk had kept himself completely in the background.

The two travellers had not the remotest suspicion that there was a mounted man near them.

Their surprise, therefore, may be imagined when they beheld the highwayman suddenly beside them.

Where he had come from they could not think.

Hawk did not allow them the opportunity of asking.

"There seems to be some obstruction in the roadway, gentlemen," he said, politely.

"There not only seems to be, but there actually is," was the reply. "Some one has been putting hurdles up. What the devil does it mean?"

"The explanation is simple enough, gentlemen."

"Indeed! Can you give it?"

"Certainly."

"Do so, then."

"This is a place appointed for toll taking," the captain continued, with the utmost gravity, "and I have been placed here to collect the dues."

"Toll!" said one of the gentlemen. "Ridiculous! You must be either mad or drunk!"

"You will find me neither one nor the other."

"Get out of the way! Down with the hurdles, Arthur!"

"Touch them who dare!" exclaimed Captain Hawk, with a sudden and startling alteration in his voice. "Gentlemen," he added, "you cannot pass here without paying tolls. If you do so quietly, all will be well."

"A highwayman, by Jove, Arthur!"

"So it seems; but he will find it no easy matter to rob the pair of us single-handed. Get your pistols ready, and stand firm!"

"As you please," said Captain Hawk, with his demeanour as unruffled as it was at first, "only I warn you, if you resist, I shall not let you go until I have taken every article of the least value that you may have about your person. On the other hand, if you like to surrender your purses quietly, you may ride on without further loss, or the least fear of violence."

His words did not fail to produce the effect.

The young man who had spoken about making a resistance now looked rather irresolutely at his comrade.

"May we believe you at your word?" he said, at length.

"Most certainly," answered Hawk.

"Then," said Arthur, "I am not going to risk a shot for the sake of a purse. Here is mine—take it!"

As he spoke he pulled a good-sized purse from his pocket, and tossed it towards the highwayman, who was dexterous enough to catch it in spite of the darkness.

The other traveller required no urging to follow his friend's example.

No doubt, to both of them, the loss of a purse was a trifling enough matter—certainly not of sufficient moment to make it worth while for them to run the least personal risk in the hope of retaining it.

"Many thanks," said Captain Hawk. "I have now all that I require."

He knocked down the hurdle as he spoke.

The young man who had been called Arthur was filled with surprise at finding that the barrier was of such a frail description.

"I'll give you my word," he said, "if I had had any idea the hurdles would have gone down with a push, I should have tried to keep my purse. At any rate, you would have had to gallop for it."

"Take my word for it," responded the captain, significantly, "things could not by any means have turned out better for you than they have. Be satisfied. Good night!"

The young men rode through the gap, and were quickly lost to sight in the darkness.

Captain Hawk remained a moment or two in hesitation.

"I have been tolerably successful," he muttered; "and the hour is getting too late for people to be abroad. Shall I be content, and make my way back again?"

After a little deliberation, the captain resolved to wait, at any rate, a short time longer upon the chance that there might be some late traveller to encounter.

But all was still, and all remained so until the highwayman's patience was exhausted.

"There's nothing more to be done to-night," he muttered, somewhat reluctantly. "But I will not complain."

He dismounted, in order to remove all traces of his barrier.

This did not occupy him many minutes, and it was just as he had finished that the distant hoofbeats of a horse reached his ears.

"Confound it!" he muttered. "What could be more annoying than this? Why couldn't he come a few minutes sooner, I should like to know? But never mind—it don't much matter."

It would have required a much more serious thing than this to ruffle Captain Hawk's composure.

He was one of those happy individuals who always make a point of taking everything by the smooth handle.

Regaining the saddle, he waited with all imaginable calmness until the traveller should reach him.

By this time the waning moon had risen.

The sky was too thickly covered with clouds for her beams to have much effect in dissipating the darkness, yet every now and then the silvery orb would show herself through one of the long, straggling rifts.

It was when she broke forth in this way that the traveller reached a spot within a few paces of where Captain Hawk was standing.

The moonbeams fell with full power upon the forms of both.

A mutual recognition took place.

Captain Hawk was the first to speak.

"Skellum!" he said. "By Jove, it's Skellum!"

CHAPTER MCXXX.

CAPTAIN HAWK COMMENCES HIS PREPARATIONS FOR EFFECTING THE ESCAPE OF DICK TURPIN FROM YORK CASTLE.

It was indeed no other than that indefatigable individual with whom Captain Hawk had so strangely met.

There could be no mistaking him.

It was not an easy matter to startle Skellum.

But surely, if ever he was startled, he was then.

"By all that's d—nable," he at last ejaculated, "it's Captain Hawk!"

Almost before the words had left his lips he drew forth a pistol, and rapidly levelling it, fired point-blank at the highwayman.

But the captain was prepared, and a slight touch of the rein caused Satan to swerve so suddenly as to foil the treacherous shot.

"Bullet for bullet, my friend!" cried Hawk, in a loud voice.

The report of his bright-barreled pistol mingled with and half drowned his words.

By what took place it would almost seem as though Skellum had attempted to follow the highwayman's plan of avoiding a bullet.

Whether this was so or not is a thing that cannot be determined.

But Skellum's horse suddenly made an odd plunging kind of movement—one for which his rider was not prepared, for in the twinkling of an eye the thief-hunter was lying on the ground.

So rapidly did this take place, and so entirely unexpected was the occurrence, that Captain Hawk was a second or two before he could credit his own senses.

There lay Skellum, however, upon the high-road, without displaying the least sign of motion.

Being cast completely over his horse's neck, he had fallen in a most awkward manner.

His head had struck the ground first, and the force of the blow was great, the roadway being as hard as a mass of iron.

His neck had then bent in some strange way, and he now laid with his head bent upon his breast.

Mechanically, Captain Hawk returned his discharged pistol to his belt.

"This is odd indeed!" he said. "Very—very strange! Is he dead, I wonder!"

Disposed as he was to make light of almost everything that took place, the highwayman on this occasion found himself unusually serious.

Skellum still remained as he had fallen.

Whether dead or only insensible it was impossible to say.

The captain deliberated with himself for a few seconds as to whether he should ride away without taking any more notice, or whether he should really attempt to find out whether the fall had been a mortal one.

The latter course was decided upon.

Not that he had any feelings of compassion towards his foe, but chiefly on the score of curiosity.

"I could hardly be content to remain in a state of doubt upon the point," he muttered, as he dismounted slowly. "It will, I daresay, be easy enough to ascertain."

Nevertheless, it was with an inward sensation of repugnance and aversion that he approached the prostrate form.

He touched it with his foot.

Skellum never stirred or gave utterance to a sound.

Overcoming his aversion by a violent effort, Hawk stooped down.

His foe was lying very awkwardly, and it was only after the exercise of much strength and trouble that he laid him, face upward, on the roadway.

The moon was not shining very brightly now, but the clouds showed a diffused light, which enabled him to see with sufficient clearness.

"Dead!" said the captain, after a momentary inspection of Skellum's pallid face. "Dead, for a thousand pounds!"

Such a sudden transition from life to death as this could scarcely have failed to make an impression upon the most callous and unreflecting heart.

Certainly the captain was not unaffected.

It cannot be said that the death of such a man as Skellum would cause him any regret; such would not have been the fact; yet he could not but be awed by the awful suddenness of the event.

In order to satisfy himself upon the point, he made another and closer examination.

But the result was the same.

Skellum was dead!

"He is past all human skill and past all meddling in human matters," the captain said, as he turned away. "It will be a shock to the next person who comes this way. At any rate, it is no concern of mine, and the sooner I am away from the spot the better, for it is quite possible that if it should be known I was the last in his company, his death would be laid upon my shoulders."

This was a reasonable enough supposition; and feeling that it was so, the captain hastened to make his way back to his snug quarters in York.

"I wonder how Dick will receive the news!" he murmured. "He will have no regrets, I fancy, except that he died so painless a death. Ah, well! We must take things as we find them—certainly Dick's escape now looks a far more likely matter, for Skellum was indefatigable."

This was a comfortable reflection, and as it was no part of the captain's philosophy to make himself miserable, he dwelt upon it for a considerable length of time.

"I have nothing to fear now on the score of funds," he continued; "and for the rest I see nothing before me to cause despair. If I do not set Dick at liberty, I shall never forgive myself, but always consider I had a hand in his death."

This was certainly looking at the matter from an extreme point of view, for in actual fact there was little blame attached to him.

So altered as Dick was at the time, it was next to an impossibility that he should have recognised him.

But the captain chose to think differently.

He blamed himself for having been guilty of a most fatal carelessness.

Should his design succeed, however, there could be no question that he had made an ample atonement for his fault, if so it can be called.

The high-road was quite deserted, and Hawk reached the Old Chequers Inn without meeting with a single person.

The ostler was waiting for his return, and so was another.

The former the captain saw, not the latter.

Had he chanced to glance up at one of the windows in the back part of the inn, he could not fail to catch a glimpse of the pale, interesting face of the girl Jessie.

"Is all well, Sam?"

"Yes, Cap'n; I think I may venture to say so."

"Venture? What do you mean?"

"Why, after you had gone, some one came here to look for you, so it was quite as well you made up your mind to take a ride for an hour or two."

"Who was it?"

"Well, that I didn't know at first, but I found out afterwards."

"Who was it, I say?"

"Don't be impatient, captain. They told me his name was Skellum."

"Ah!"

"And that he was death on to all the highwaymen."

"And now death is on to him."

"What do you say, cap'n?"

"Nothing at least, it does not matter. Let me see you put Satan all right, and I will try a turn-in for an hour or two."

"Can't you trust me to do it, cap'n?"

"Yes, I daresay I could; but I would prefer using my own eyes for all that."

The ostler said no more.

The highwayman's steed was taken into the stable and thoroughly attended to.

When the operation was complete, the captain crossed the inn yard again to the little door which we mentioned on a former occasion.

Now, as then, it yielded to his touch.

But he took the precaution to secure it after him, and then stepped cautiously along the passage.

A fire was still burning, and the apartment presented that appearance of comfort which nothing but the presence of a woman can impart.

Very probably much of this was quite lost upon Captain Hawk—at least, such may be inferred by the indifferent manner in which he crossed the chamber and entered an adjoining room.

This was fitted up with the same neatness as a bedchamber.

Having satisfied himself that everything presented its usual aspect, he prepared to sleep.

His right hand grasped the singularly-shaped butt of his ominously-named pistol, and so he fell into a profound slumber.

The habit of sleeping with his fingers encircling his weapon was so firmly fixed that he would have found it next to an impossibility to close his eyes without doing so.

At the Old Chequers, however, he had nothing to fear.

Morning came without anything whatever having taken place to disturb him, nor did he awake until the sun shone full upon his face.

"I am later than I intended to be," he muttered; "yet if I make haste I shall be in time."

It was evident, by his manner, that he had business on hand of more than usual importance.

His morning preparations were soon completed.

In one corner of the room was a large chest, and this he opened by means of a key that he took from an inner pocket.

Just under the lid was a small travelling portmanteau of the kind then carried by almost everyone who had to make a journey, at the time when locomotion was so different a thing from what it is now.

This he took out, and nothing else.

Carefully locking the chest again, he threw on his ample cloak, which not only to a very great extent served as a disguise, but also concealed what he was carrying in his hand, and prepared to depart.

He made his way quickly to the stables, saw that Satan was safe and well, and then turning to the ostler, said:

"Mind, I leave him in your charge, and shall hold you responsible if anything happens to him."

"Make your mind easy about that, cap'n. When shall you be back?"

"I cannot say—I can only tell you to be prepared at any minute."

So saying, with an easy and confident step, as though he had nothing in the world to dread from recognition, he left the inn yard.

"He's a rum 'un—he is," the ostler said, confidentially to himself. "What I should call a regular out-and-outer. Sam's wrong if something more isn't heard of Captain Hawk than of any other gentleman highwayman who ever cried 'Stand!' on the high-road."

Having delivered himself of this opinion, the ostler returned to his duties.

Captain Hawk took the nearest way out of the city, and when he had fairly gained the open country, plunged into the intricacies of narrow lanes with a readiness which showed that he must have possessed a very familiar acquaintance with the locality.

At length, crossing a stile, he strode rapidly along a narrow footpath, which apparently led in a direct line towards a wood, which seemed to be of great extent.

"All's well!" muttered Hawk, as he glanced around him. "Not a soul is in sight."

So saying, he quickened his steps.

On entering the wood, he followed the footpath for a short distance only, but turned off to the right, where the trees grew most densely, and disappeared.

It was very nearly an hour after this event that a wood-cutter, whistling blithely, crossed the stile we have before had occasion to mention.

It was evident that the wood was his destination, for he followed precisely in the captain's steps.

When within perhaps a dozen paces of those trees which formed a border to the wood, he caught the sound of a footstep, which caused him to raise his eyes and look straight before him.

He then beheld emerging from the trees a person who by his attire was a Roman Catholic priest.

The reverend father advanced with a devout footstep, apparently being busily engaged in communing with himself.

Now, this poor wood-cutter happened to be a Catholic, and upon catching sight of one of the ministers of his religion he made a low obeisance.

The priest was to all appearances deeply absorbed in his meditations, for he started when he saw the wood-cutter bending devoutly before him.

But regaining his composure, as one may say, immediately, he muttered some words in a tone too low for them to be audible.

The wood-cutter seemed to be satisfied, however, for he resumed his way.

"So far, very good," murmured the priest, when sure the man was out of ear-shot. "My disguise has imposed upon you, at any rate, so I may reasonably look for like success elsewhere."

As the reader must know, this seeming priest was no other than Captain Hawk, though the disguise was so excellent and the make-up so perfect, that it would have required a more than ordinary amount of a astuteness to have guessed at his identity.

But Captain Hawk had quite a talent for disguises.

On reaching the stile he once more carefully surveyed the surrounding scene.

"That must be my way," he said at length. "It cannot be far from here, I know."

Feeling quite sure that there were no prying eyes upon him, the captain strode along at what would have been considered an unseemly pace for one of his cloth.

At length he reached a handsome pair of lodge gates, apparently communicating with a mansion of no ordinary importance.

The gates were closed, but the captain gave a summons for admittance.

The woman who emerged from the lodge unlocked the gates without venturing to ask a single question.

Muttering something that might be supposed a blessing, the captain passed on.

The avenue was a long one, and some time elapsed before he came in sight of the mansion.

"A comfortable place," he muttered, when his eyes first encountered it. "Surely whoever dwells there should be happy."

With a degree of boldness which argued well for the captain's strength of nerve, he walked direct to the imposing-looking front-door and rang the bell.

"Is Sir Humphrey within?" he asked of the servant.

"He is, holy sir."

The seeming priest was ushered into a small room, there to wait the baronet's appearance—for it was to Sir Humphrey Yeoman's residence that the captain had thus boldly made his way.

He had not long to wait before the baronet made his appearance.

"Your business?" he said, briefly; for priests were no favourites of his, and he was apt to treat them with scant civility.

"Sir Humphrey," said Captain Hawk, in low, monotonous tones, "I come to you in your magisterial capacity."

The baronet inclined his head slightly.

"I wish you to favour me with a letter that will enable me to have free and unrestricted communion with a prisoner who is now in York Castle, and who is sadly in want of my spiritual aid."

"Do you mean Dick Turpin?"

"I do."

"Then, if I thought Dick wanted you, and that you could do him any good, I would give you the order in a moment. But," he interrupted, "surely there can be no need for my influence in this matter. The cells are always free to the spiritual advisers of the accused."

"Ordinarily, your worship," said Hawk, with a great show of meekness; "but in the present case, such stringent precautions have been adopted, in consequence of the dread the authorities have that an escape would be attempted, that I fear, unless protected by the signature of some influential gentleman like yourself, I shall be subjected to all kinds of impediments."

"Well," said Sir Humphrey, "as I told you a moment or two ago, if I thought Dick wanted you, and that you could do him the least good, you could command me in any way you think proper."

During his conversation with Dick, Captain Hawk had gathered a tolerably clear notion of Sir Humphrey's character, and after such an unequivocal admission as he had just made, he felt strongly tempted to tell him all.

"Believe me," said the captain, after a momentary pause, and raising his eyes for the first time to the baronet's countenance—"believe me that Dick does want me, and that I can do him much good."

The words were pronounced in so significant a tone, that the baronet could not help being struck by them.

"What do you mean?" he asked.

"Just what I say."

"But explain yourself. If you are a friend of Dick Turpin's, as I suspect you are, despite your cloth, do not hesitate to confide in me."

CHAPTER MOXXXI.

CAPTAIN HAWK PAYS DICK TURPIN ANOTHER VISIT IN YORK CASTLE.

"I WILL not hesitate," said Captain Hawk, with sudden resolution, "for I know you are to be wholly trusted, and therefore I will tell you all."

The baronet nodded, as though to intimate that this was decidedly the best course that could be adopted.

"This, then, is a disguise."

"I thought as much."

"I am Dick's last remaining comrade, and, to a certain extent, to blame for what has happened to him."

"How do you mean?"

The captain explained.

"Go on."

"The fault committed cannot be recalled; but one thing remains to me, and that is to make reparation. This I have sworn to do."

"And what do you propose?"

"To assist him to escape."

Sir Humphrey looked grave.

"You need not fear that I shall compromise you in the matter. There is no need for anyone to know that you even suspect me to be other than I seem. Let me give you the assurance that I shall not play my part clumsily; or if I am discovered, no one will have to suffer for it but myself."

"But, seriously, do you think you stand any chance of success?"

"Certainly I do, or I should not contemplate making the attempt."

"Then, let me tell you that in my opinion you stand scarcely the ghost of a chance."

Captain Hawk smiled.

"Leave that to me, your worship. If you are in earnest in saying that you wish to befriend Dick, believe me you cannot choose a more effectual way of d- g so than by writing me the free pass I require."

"You shall have it."

"Many thanks! Of course it will be sufficient?"

"Oh yes! I have only to tell you that you must be cautious."

"For Dick's sake, you may rely upon it, I shall be."

Sir Humphrey sat down, and taking a pen, scribbled a few words upon a sheet of paper, and then, with a vast deal of flourish, appended his signature.

"There," he said—"that will do."

"My best thanks are your due," answered Captain Hawk, carefully securing the much-prized document; "and I trust the next intelligence you may receive will be that Dick is once more at liberty."

"Get him out of the country, if you can. It is a thousand pities he should die by such a death as I fear awaits him. Say from me that as soon as he reaches foreign parts he is to write and make me acquainted with his whereabouts."

"This is most generous."

"Tut, tut! He would do, and has done, ten times as much for me. He showed me very plainly that I was blindly labouring to secure my daughter's misery, not her happiness. But never mind that now. Money will be required for the accomplishment of your plan. Take this to aid you; if you want more, apply to me."

He placed a well-filled bag of money in the captain's hand.

"Don't refuse it, as Dick did," he added. "He told me he had no occasion for it, but you must know better. All I ask is that you keep my share in this transaction a secret."

"Rely upon me," answered Captain Hawk. "Thanks to fortune, I am not short of funds; but yet your gift will be certain to prove useful."

Little more of any importance was exchanged.

The captain himself was by no means inclined to prolong the interview, because the day was getting on apace, and he had much to do.

On taking his leave, he made his way back direct to York.

He was careful to avoid passing near the Old Chequers Inn.

On arriving at the Castle, which was his destination, he presented his pass, and, to his great satisfaction, was admitted without demur.

To Dick Turpin the hours had followed each other very slowly since his friend had paid him his visit.

He had had no other companionship but his own thoughts, which were gloomy and sad indeed, yet even these were preferable to the annoyance perpetual interruptions caused him.

Having had no intimation of the captain's intention, he naturally looked surprised when he saw so monkish-looking an individual appear upon the threshold.

The jailer seemed inclined to linger in the cell, but after a time withdrew.

The sham priest seated himself beside the prisoner, bending his head so much forward that his features could not be distinguished by anyone.

"Keep quiet, Dick," he said, in tones scarcely above a whisper. "The cell door is not shut, and if you raise your voice I shall be in danger of detection."

Dick had to make use of all his self-command while his comrade thus spoke.

Until he opened his lips he had no suspicion of his visitor's identity—a strong and convincing proof of the captain's skill in disguising himself.

"Give me your hand," said Turpin—"let me press it only for an instant, and then I shall feel more sure as to who you are."

"There—there, that will do. Such an action as that, if seen, would betray us."

A hurried pressure of hands took place.

"How strange it seems," said Dick, "that, in defiance of all the strongest regulations which have been adopted, you should be able to make your way here, as it seems, just when you choose."

"It is more in appearance than in reality. I have seen Sir Humphrey once more, and my object in doing so was to obtain his signature. Armed with that, I at once disarm a thousand suspicions, because it would be considered that he would not give it to me unless he knew who I was, and felt I could be trusted."

"I see," said Dick. "Such a credential would be invaluable."

"Exactly. But never mind that. I have other matters of greater importance than that to talk about. Skellum is dead."

"What?"

"Hush—hush! You must be more cautious or we shall be ruined."

"Did I hear rightly?"

"You did."

"Repeat it."

"Skellum is dead!"

The captain then followed with a description of the events of the night.

"I lived in hopes of having a reckoning with him some day," said Dick. "I could almost regret that he is gone."

"Pooh—pooh! You ought to look upon it as a piece of extraordinary good fortune. Without his never-ceasing supervisions all these precautions will be relaxed—more especially when it is seen that there really seems no necessity for them."

"There is encouragement in that."

"Encouragement! I should think there is! Before, the escape was only possible—now it is probable: that is, if you will perform your part."

"Can you have any doubt about my doing that?"

"I ought not to have."

"You have heard when the trial is to take place?"

"At the next assizes."

"Do you know when they commence?"

"No. Do you?"

"Yes—in three days' time."

"In three days?" repeated the captain. "That leaves but little time for preparation."

"Too little, I fear. The time between now and then will be one of incessant preparation. There will hardly be a chance."

This intelligence plunged Captain Hawk for some time in deep reflection.

He had not expected that the trial would come on so soon, and in consequence the plans he had laid were a little deranged.

"Why are you silent?" asked Dick Turpin.

"I was thinking—about the escape."

"No doubt you are of the same opinion as myself."

"What is that?"

"Why, that it will be wisest to defer the attempt until after the trial; not that I have anything to hope from it, but because then I believe the chances of success will be so much greater."

"And three days is not very long to make all preparations," added the captain.

"Not time enough, rely upon it. At the trial I shall take care to behave as though I was deeply impressed with the feeling that it was useless to resist, and that I had resigned myself to an inevitable fate."

"No doubt that will throw them off their guard, especially as you have nothing now to fear from Skellum's personal interference. If we could only get the guard removed which watches round the exterior of the prison, the rest would be comparatively easy."

While speaking these last words, he took from beneath his robe a small packet, which he slipped quietly and stealthily into Dick's hand.

"Never mind looking at it now; secrete it somewhere until you are sure you have a good opportunity."

"Thanks," said Dick, giving instant obedience. "I may be sure it is something valuable."

"I believe you will find it so. The parcel contains several small skeleton keys of various sizes. They are the best things of the kind to be had for money. I noticed yesterday that your irons were locked upon you, not riveted. You will now, I hope, be able to free yourself from them in the night, and enjoy something like repose; only you must be careful to put them on again in the morning."

"If I can manage that," said Dick, "it will be a boon indeed. These heavy irons, so constantly upon my limbs, cramp me and weigh me down. To be rid of them, if only for an hour, would be an indescribable relief."

"Then I think you will be able to accomplish so to-night. In the meanwhile, I shall set carefully to work, and see that all things are in perfect readiness. I will go now, for my visit has already been a long one."

"And shall you come again?"

"I think not till after the trial; at any rate, not unless something sufficiently important occurs to warrant me in doing so. I can render no further service that I am aware of, and by staying away I diminish the chances of my recognition. Not that I study this from a personal motive, but because, if I am taken, all hopes of your escape, I am afraid, will vanish."

"I am sure they will; and not only for my sake, but for your own, be careful."

The captain laughed silently.

Then, rising, he whispered the word farewell.

Fain would Dick have detained him, but he felt he had no reasonable excuse for so doing.

Yet it would be hard to convey any idea of the desolate feeling which took possession of his heart as soon as the door closed behind this faithful and well-tried friend.

To speak the truth, Dick, upon reflection, had felt by no means sanguine as to the result of an escape.

He was resolved to attempt one, however, because, if he perished in the effort, he would rather a thousand times die so than undergo the last dread penalty of the law.

But the intelligence that Skellum had so suddenly and unexpectedly met with his death materially changed his feelings on the subject.

He was in truth the barrier which he had most to dread.

Now he was removed.

The prospect of being able to relieve his body of the terrible weight of his fetters could not fail to afford a certain amount of satisfaction.

It made him long impatiently for the approach of night.

At about nine o'clock every evening the Governor made a round of the entire prison.

On each occasion he had entered Dick's cell and satisfied himself by a careful personal inspection that the prisoner was safe, and that his fetters showed no signs of having been tampered with.

After this visit, Dick was left uninterrupted till the hour of seven in the morning.

Punctual to the hour, the Governor came.

He looked carefully around as usual.

All seemed well.

When the door was closed again and the sound of footsteps along the corridor without had died away, Dick could scarcely contain himself.

He had a chance now to be comparatively free for nearly ten hours.

The packet or skeleton keys had been carefully secreted, and now, with a trembling hand, he drew it forth.

The keys were all small, of such size as would be used for a padlock.

Dick tried several hastily, and at last had the satisfaction of feeling the wards of the lock yield.

In less than ten minutes afterwards he had rid himself of his disagreeable incumbrances altogether.

Of course, he had to display the utmost caution in all his movements, because any unusual clanking of his irons reaching the ears of the man who watched outside might so far arouse suspicion as to cause him to look in.

In the event of such a thing as this, not only would he be discovered, but such precautions adopted as would prevent him from ever achieving his object again.

Almost without making a sound at all, however, Dick laid his fetters one by one aside.

Then, with the most intense sigh of relief which can be conceived, he stood erect.

Oh! it was a glorious thing to be even temporarily free from his manacles, for they seemed not only to weigh down the body, but to crush the mind also.

He stretched every weary limb, and then, taking care to tread lightly, paced up and down the cell.

It was the first exercise he had been permitted to take since the discovery of his identity.

This action very disagreeably impressed upon his mind that he was by no means so strong as he had fancied himself to be.

The temporary depression which this produced he shook off by remembering that it was quite as well he had found it out now instead of at a time when it might be of the utmost importance for him to possess full strength.

"This exercise will benefit me wonderfully," he soliloquised. "In three days' time I shall be thrice as strong as I am now."

Fatigue at length compelled him to return to his seat.

The night was a light one, for the moon was shining in the heavens unobscured by a single cloud.

Her beams chanced to find their way into the cell in such a manner as to light up the greater part of it.

The silvery radiance fell upon the worn and wasted form of the highwayman, who, as he gazed at the bright face of the queen of night, sighed heavily.

Most forcibly was brought to his remembrance the time when, guided by her rays, he had made his way across the country on the back of bonny Black Bess.

He could not think upon the past and maintain his firmness.

His emotions overcame him, and for some time he let them have their way without the least restraint.

But by degrees the violence of his feelings subsided.

Gazing once more upon the moon, the desire came into his mind to climb up to the cell window and see what was visible from without.

He knew his cell was at some height above the ground, and fancied it must be in a tower, for it was partly circular in shape.

Of course he was not long in gratifying a longing of this sort when once he had decided upon it.

The grated aperture in the cell, by courtesy called a window, was high up in the wall, being placed, in fact, close to the juncture of the latter with the ceiling.

But Dick's cell was furnished with a chair and a table, and by placing one on the other he was able to reach to a good height.

It was no easy task, however, to make these preparations without causing any sound that would attract attention, for at this midnight hour a silence like that of the grave itself prevailed in the prison.

At length he mounted, and grasping the bars with his hands, pressed his face closely against them.

Oh, how sweetly and refreshingly the cool night air blew upon his burning brow!

How beautiful the scene looked without now every object was silvered over with the moon's beams!

How ineffable was the yearning he felt to break away from his confinement!

For some moments Dick remained gazing in a kind of ecstasy or trance.

But when calm reason came back to his aid he took more careful note of the situation of his cell window.

In the first place he made the discovery that he was at a much greater height from the ground than he had believed.

But as he looked he saw that the tallest roofs anywhere visible around were considerably below him.

So far as he was able to tell, too, there was a small paved yard protected by a stone wall, which formed a boundary to the prison.

While gazing down he caught sight of the forms of two men who were advancing towards each other.

When within a certain distance they paused, and apparently exchanged some words, though no sound reached Dick's listening ears.

Then turning round, both retraced their steps.

CHAPTER MCXXXII.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN IS BROUGHT TO TRIAL.

Dick Turpin watched both figures till they disappeared from view.

Then, after a while, they appeared again, advanced to the same spot and retired.

"That is the outside watch of which the captain spoke; and while that is kept up, how am I to escape?"

There seemed to be but one reply which could be given to this question.

While the guard did its duty escape was impossible.

There was just the possibility that, now Skellum was no more, this precaution would, after the trial, be dispensed with as superfluous.

How frail a hope this was everyone must see.

But it was the prisoner's only hope, and he seemed to cling to it with all the more tenacity because he knew it was so slight.

"Were it not for those fellows," he continued, recently afterwards, "I could see my way clear enough, with such aid as Captain Hawk could afford me. A steel saw would be wanted to cut through these bars, a rope long enough to enable me to reach the ground, and then another rope, flung over the outer wall at the proper moment, which would enable me to scale that."

After this, escape seemed quite an easy matter, could the men who watched outside be anyhow got rid of.

Dick remained watching for a long time—how long he did not trouble himself to think.

But during the whole of the period, the men kept up their patrolling backwards and forwards with the most provoking regularity.

Wearied out, at length, with watching, and finding that there was nothing else to take cognizance of, and no advantage in remaining there, he cautiously descended.

Yet he felt this was a privilege scarcely to be enough valued, and a feeling of the greatest gratitude towards Captain Hawk held possession of his heart.

There was yet time enough for him to enjoy a good period of repose; but his fear was that, when once falling asleep, his slumber would be so deep that he would be unable to awake at the proper moment.

Nevertheless he flung himself down at full length, enjoying to the utmost the pleasure of stretching his limbs at freedom.

As may be expected, the end of this was that he unconsciously fell off to sleep.

Awaking with a sudden start, he found himself very cold, and surrounded by an intense darkness.

He knew well that when the jailer paid him his first visit it was scarcely daylight, and, therefore, with some trepidation, he set about the task of relocking the fetters upon his limbs.

Never, however, was any necessary act performed with more unwillingness.

He paused several times, for he was strongly assailed with the temptation to spring upon his jailer when he entered, fling him down, and trust to the confusion which would ensue to effect his escape.

The chances of success, however, if he adopted this course, were so very, very slight, that he felt he could not afford to venture upon it.

If he failed—and the chances were as ten thousand to one that he would fail—more stringent precautions than ever would be taken, instead of a relaxation of those already in force, which was what he was hoping for.

An indiscreet attempt would only serve to mar all chances of the favourable accomplishment of a better-matured plan.

Governed by these considerations, then, he went on with his unwelcome task, though many a heavy, regretful sigh escaped his breast.

He had barely time to finish and to conceal the key which had been of such immense service to him when the sound of distant footsteps warned him of the approach of the turnkey.

Upon entering, the man, according to his custom, glanced around in order to see whether everything presented its usual aspect.

On the present occasion he saw nothing to excite his suspicions, for Dick had been extremely careful to restore everything exactly to its former position.

The day passed without the occurrence of any particular incident to break the monotony of prison life.

Dick was enabled to preserve his cheerfulness by looking forward to the comparative freedom he should enjoy at night.

Towards evening, in accordance with Sir Humphrey's recommendation, Mr. Steel, the solicitor, paid Dick a visit.

"It would be wrong of me," he said, "to lead you to suppose that there is the slightest chance of my being able to do the least good for you. Still, I will watch the case, though that must not buoy you up with any false hopes. I am truly sorry for you, and should rejoice to see you at liberty."

"Many thanks for your kind wishes, but the caution you have just given me is a needless one. I knew well enough from the first that the trial would be a mere form, and that I am as good as sentenced already. It was Sir Humphrey who would insist that you should try to help me."

"And so I will; and what is more, I shall try with all my heart," said the attorney, earnestly. "I cannot forget what you have done; and you may depend that, should anything arise which can possibly be turned to your advantage, it shall be."

"You have my best thanks for that assurance, though still," Dick added, "I know already the termination of the trial."

Mr. Steel must have been fully impressed with the hopelessness of Dick's case, for he never asked him a single question concerning it.

Dick, however, thought fit to set him right as regards the facts.

"Of the particular crime laid to my charge I am not guilty."

"I am afraid that will avail you little."

"I do not expect much from it; still, you may as well know the actual truth."

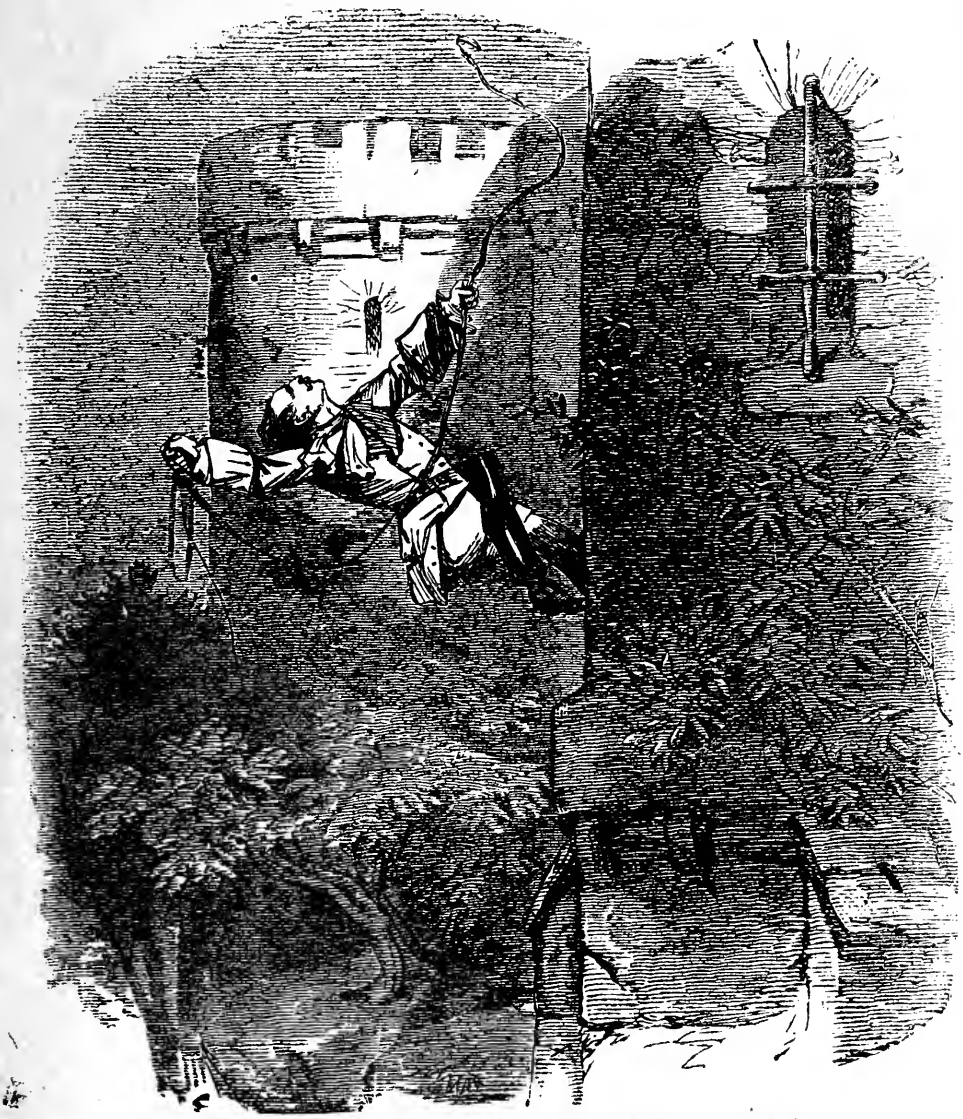
Dick then described as well as he was able the way in which the ostler met his death.

Mr. Steel shook his head.

"I will bear the particulars in mind," he said; "but you must be aware that the dying witnessed testimony of any person has great weight in a court of law, and you have only your bare word to bring against it."

"I understand you," said Dick. "Still, I should have felt more reconciled had the charge against me possessed some foundation."

The attorney left soon after, and when Dick was left to himself he muttered:



"I am now convinced that I have no hope to look forward to in that quarter."

His sole reliance rested upon Captain Hawk.

It was strong, it is true; but then, he could not help remembering that, after all, it was not much to depend upon.

The captain himself stood in hazard of his life, and was liable to detection at any moment—particularly liable, one would think, when his habitual recklessness and carelessness of consequences is borne in mind.

Should he be discovered or captured, nothing could save Dick from his impending doom.

[DICK TURPIN FAILS IN HIS ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE FROM YORK CASTLE.]

When the prisoner was once again freed from his fetters, he found himself able to take a more cheerful view of matters—a brighter light seemed thrown upon the events of the future.

This went on thus without the occurrence of aught deserving of special mention, until the morning of the trial arrived.

It seems almost needless to say that the deepest interest was manifested by all the inhabitants of the city, and that extraordinary efforts were necessary in order to have a chance of witnessing the interesting proceedings.

A great improvement had taken place in Dick's personal appearance since his last examination, and on the present occasion he paid particular attention to his toilet.

He did not succeed, however, in his attempt to bear some resemblance to his former self—his old acquaintances would scarcely have known him now.

In fact, at least twenty years seemed to have been added to his age, while his hair was perceptibly streaked with gray.

But his eyes retained their brightness, and many remarked what an eagle-like glance it was which he gave on first making his appearance in the Court.

The general hum and buzz which had hitherto prevailed among the densely-packed audience ceased as soon as he entered the dock.

It was strange indeed to see so many, many faces all so closely packed, and all turned towards one point.

It is not to be wondered at if the prisoner did shrink a little upon finding himself the focus of so many eyes.

But the action could hardly have been a momentary one, and then, having drawn himself up to his full height, he gave that rapid and searching glance around him of which we have just made mention.

But he dropped his eyes almost instantly.

Rapid as was his glance, it had nevertheless satisfied him upon one point.

Captain Hawk was in Court.

Dick wondered at his hardihood, for the recognition was instantaneous, and he only dropped his eyes because he was afraid that his friend might be indiscreet enough to make some sign.

The expression on the captain's face at the moment when he first caught sight of it was such as to make Dick feel that so far events had gone on well.

The silence which had greeted the prisoner's first appearance was of short duration.

A general murmur arose, so loud as to prevent the commencement of the business of the Court.

In vain the usher bawled for silence till he was as red in the face as the trimming on his robe.

It was not until the judge arose and positively declared that, at all hazards, the Court should be cleared, that anything resembling order was obtained.

The usual formalities observed on such occasions were then proceeded with.

But we will not weary the reader by describing them in detail.

The Clerk of the Arraigns rose, and read over the indictment.

The ceremony, however, appeared to be one which might very well have been dispensed with, for no one paid the least attention to it.

The judge held a whispered conversation with the Lord-Lieutenant of the county, who had taken his seat upon the bench.

The barristers at the table below amused and busied themselves in various ways.

At last the clerk stopped with a sudden jerk.

"Prisoner at the bar," he exclaimed, "you are charged upon this indictment with the crime of wilful murder. Are you guilty or not guilty?"

"Not guilty!" responded Dick, in a voice, though apparently low, was nevertheless distinctly audible in every corner of the Court.

The plea was recorded, and the business of the trial fairly began.

It was not until this moment that Dick noticed among the many influential gentlemen who had been accommodated with seats on the bench was his stanch friend, Sir Humphrey Yeomans.

The prosecution was conducted by the Attorney-General himself.

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury," he said, in a rapid voice, "it is far from my intention to occupy your time and attention for many minutes on the present occasion. To those few remarks which I have to make, I earnestly desire you will give your entire attention.

"The prisoner at the bar is, I suppose, entitled to the claim of being considered one of the most notorious characters in the land. His misdeeds and daring defiance of justice are so well known that it is quite unnecessary for me to dwell upon them here.

"Aided by numerous well-paid accomplices, and by the poorer sort of people, whose good will he had gained by a few acts of interested liberality, he has succeeded in keeping at bay all the many parties of officers that have been sent out in pursuit of him.

"But that inevitable end which could have been foreseen by anyone, has come at last—his time of triumph is over—he is here in the dock before you on a charge affecting his life.

"In the case of such criminals as the prisoner at the bar (let us be thankful, gentlemen, that there are so few of them,) it is often felt to be a matter of some difficulty to fix upon some specific charge against them, and bring the accusation home to them.

"When such notorious offenders are secured after the expenditure of so much time and trouble, it almost seems that the formality of a trial could be done away with and the speediest steps taken for execution.

"But the English law is jealous of the rights of every man, even when all claim upon the forbearance of society is forfeited, as in the case of the prisoner at the bar.

"It is a matter of gratification to me—not merely that there is no difficulty in fixing upon a specific charge, but because the crime of which he is accused has been committed only a short time, and the evidence upon it is so clear and complete as to leave no doubt of the prisoner's guilt.

"The crime is that of murder—the one which all mankind holds in the most abhorrence. As you are well aware, the penalty is death.

"Leaving out of consideration all the manifold acts of turpitude which have been committed by the prisoner at the bar, we will try him on the present charge, for had he been ten times as guilty as he is the punishment would still have been death.

"I shall now proceed to call witnesses before you—having first read this deposition made by the expiring man—who will be able to show that on the evening of the 18th of the last month the prisoner at the bar did wilfully and with malice prepense, wound to the death one Samuel Thorpe, who held the situation of ostler at the Crown and Cushion, the well-known inn on the London Road."

The Attorney-General then read over the document containing the ostler's deposition.

As the reader is aware, it gave anything but a fair and just account of what had taken place, for it stated that Dick had, alternately by promises and threats, endeavoured to persuade the ostler to furnish him with a horse in order that he might complete his escape. With this demand the ostler stated he resolutely refused to comply, and in consequence the prisoner had drawn his sword and plunged it into his breast before he had time to step aside or defend himself.

The reader, being in possession of the actual facts as they occurred, will be able to see how grossly the mercenary and treacherous ostler misrepresented what had occurred.

Those witnesses who had appeared before the magistrate at the final examination now again stood forward and repeated the testimony they had previously given, which for the most part was correct enough.

Then medical evidence was given respecting the wound, and a proper certificate of the ostler's death.

With this, the case for the prosecution closed.

Mr. Steel, to the surprise of many in Court, then rose up, and, after glancing around, said:

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury,—

"I am not about, in the ordinary sense of the term, to defend the prisoner at the bar, but I am here to make to you a statement which he desires should go forth to the world.

"It is to effect that he is guiltless of the charge now brought against him. He solemnly avers that——"

The Attorney-General jumped up.

"My lord," he said, "I protest against this irregularity. If my learned friend has any evidence to offer on the the part of the prisoner at the bar, well and good—let it be forthcoming; but if, as I imagine, he is only about to repeat some general declaration of innocence made by the prisoner, and unsupported by testimony, I submit that the present is not a fitting opportunity for doing so. I feel certain your lordship will support me in saying that the proper time for the making of such a statement is after the recordation of the verdict."

The judge ruled that his learned friend was right, and Mr. Steel sat down with his statement unmade.

The Attorney-General rose again.

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury,—

"I cannot refrain from directing your attention to the singular manner in which the identity of the prisoner at the bar was discovered. The hand of Providence cannot be more plainly traceable than in this instance. The prisoner, maddened with drink, is taken prisoner and locked up without the existence of the faintest suspicion of who he was—so greatly has he altered during the last few months of his wretched existence.

"But for the merest chance he would undoubtedly have been set at liberty again, when he would doubtless have succeeded in effecting his escape. But the ends of justice were not then to be set aside. He was called upon to find a surety for his future good conduct. This he could not obtain. Then it seems he wrote a letter to his brother, who is, I am given to understand, a worthy, honest man, requesting him to come forward and be bail for him. This letter was posted unpaid for, the brother refused to pay the postage, and the letter was finally sent to London to be opened and returned to the sender. It was then that the almost incredible discovery was made that the writer was no other than the famous—or shall I say in-famous—Dick Turpin, and that he was at that moment safely within the walls of York Castle, while the police officers were vainly searching for him in every direction. His identification followed; and at the same time he was indicted for the wilful murder of the ostler at the road-side inn."

CHAPTER MCXXXIII.

SENTENCE OF DEATH IS PRONOUNCED UPON DICK TURPIN.

WHAT is called nowadays a "sensation" followed the Attorney-General's remarks.

Such a strange concatenation of circumstances was well calculated to excite a more than common degree of interest.

The judge now proceeded to sum up the evidence.

The task was by no means a difficult one, and did not occupy him many minutes.

He dwelt upon the weight which always attaches itself to the testimony of one like the ostler, who made his statements in the full belief that he had not much longer to live in this world.

He referred, too, to the extraordinary manner in which Dick had been secured.

He observed how strange it was to think that, after so many fruitless efforts to capture him, he should at last so singularly be found in custody.

The evidence was so clear, he said, that he did not for his own part see how the jury could have any hesitation or difficulty about coming to a verdict.

The jury appeared to have no difficulty.

Those who sat on the front row of seats turned round to those behind them and exchanged a whisper.

Then all sat down, and the foreman rose up.

"Gentlemen of the jury, have you considered your verdict?"

"We have."

"Do you find the prisoner at the bar guilty or not guilty?"

"Guilty!"

This announcement took no one by surprise, for the simple reason that every person in Court had fully expected it.

"Prisoner at the bar," said the Clerk of the Arraigns, "you have heard the verdict. Have you anything to say why sentence should not be passed upon you?"

Dick leaned forward towards Mr. Steel, who whispered energetically for a moment.

Then the latter, turning round to the Court, said:

"My lord, the prisoner desires me to make the statement which I was about to give when interrupted by my learned friend. It is brief.

"He solemnly avers that he is guiltless of the crime laid to his charge. He does not pretend to dispute his identity; but he wishes it to be known that what the ostler has sworn to as his dying deposition is not actually in accordance with facts. The prisoner declares that the ostler offered to aid him to escape, provided he well paid him for doing so; but finding that more money was to be made by surrendering him a prisoner and claiming the reward, he resolved upon that course. Accordingly, he administered some drugged brandy to the prisoner, who did not discover it until he had swallowed a considerable portion of the liquor. Finding the plot discovered, the ostler rushed forward with the intention of overpowering him, and in doing so became impaled upon the point of the prisoner's sword, which he held out before him in an attitude of defence; so that it will be seen the ostler was actually the author and bringer about of his own death."

The statement was listened to attentively.

As soon as Mr. Steel sat down, the judge assumed the black cap, and proceeded to pass sentence.

"Prisoner at the bar," he said, "you have this day been found guilty, upon the clearest evidence, of the heinous crime of wilful murder. You must know that your bare statement can have but little notice when weighed against the testimony of a man at the point of death, and who could have no motive for misrepresentation.

"But leaving this point, it is quite patent that you are guilty of innumerable crimes, all of which are punishable by death, and for this reason I feel no compunction in pronouncing the sentence of the Court, which is, that you be taken hence to the place whence you came, and thence to the place appointed for execution, and that you be there hanged by the neck until you be dead; and may Heaven extend that forgiveness towards you which the law will not permit us to show on earth!"

An impressive silence followed.

The two men who had stood beside Dick during the whole examination now signified that it was time for him to depart.

Before leaving, however, Dick turned his eyes to the spot where Captain Hawk was sitting.

He was greeted in a moment by a reassuring smile.

That did wonders for Dick's heart, which had grown very—very heavy during the progress of the trial.

He would not have been human had it not done so.

But Captain Hawk's smile gave him hope, and held out the assurance that after all he might yet succeed in eluding the vigilance of his jailers and become a free man.

Dick was now conducted to a different cell to the one he had formerly occupied, though the resemblance between the two was so great that they could scarcely have been distinguished from one another.

Like the former one, this was situated near the top of the castle keep.

It had one small window near the ceiling—a window that was very strongly barred.

He was again loaded with fetters, and left to pass as best he might the brief time that was to elapse before the day came for his execution.

Dick longed earnestly for night to come.

He was anxious to climb up to the grated window and peep out, in order to ascertain whether it commanded the same view as the other one.

Fortunately, the small bunch of skeleton keys had not been found, and as soon as ever the last visit was paid Dick set to work to put his doubts at rest.

Practice had now rendered him expert in the removal of his fetters.

Having freed himself from them, he mounted up to the window by the same means as before—that is to say, by the aid of the chair and table.

The night was by no means a favourable one for observation, as there was no moon.

Still, he was enabled to discern after awhile the roof-tops beneath him and the boundary-wall.

Whether the watch was continued he was unable to ascertain.

Wearied out at length, he laid down to sleep.

As might be expected, his slumber was not a very calm or peaceful one.

It was disturbed by many images, and all of them of a painful kind.

As soon as the prison was opened to visitors, Captain Hawk appeared.

He was still disguised as a Roman Catholic priest, and, having Sir Humphrey's credential, no suspicion was felt about him.

The authorities were quite willing that the prisoner should be ministered to by a member of any faith he thought fit.

Captain Hawk played his part with more ability on this occasion than before.

He knelt down beside Dick, and while in this position slipped into the prisoner's hands a small steel saw.

It was a wonderful tool, most exquisitely made, of the best temper, and so small that there could be little or no difficulty in keeping it concealed.

"Dick," he whispered, "whatever you do, take care of that saw, for upon it depends your freedom."

"Fear nothing on that head," said Turpin. "Has all gone well?"

"Better than I could wish."

The manner in which this sentence was pronounced, more than the words themselves, revived Dick's hopes.

His eyes sparkled with something like their former lustre as he glanced at his companion and waited to hear more.

"The outside guard?" he said, interrogatively, finding the captain did not speak.

"It is removed."

"Removed? Are you sure of that?"

"There was no guard last night; and I heard a whisper to the effect that it would not be renewed, as they were confident of your security."

Dick's lip curled with a derisive smile.

"It would be different if Skellum lived," he said.

"No doubt. You have good reason to congratulate yourself upon his removal."

"And how have you planned my escape?"

"Very simply. This cell of yours is nearly at the top of the building."

"I know it."

"That grated window yonder looks into a small court-yard."

Dick nodded.

"You must work with the steel saw at those bars yonder until you are able to remove them at a moment's notice."

"But how shall I reach the court-yard? You see there is no material here by which a rope could be manufactured."

"I will supply you with one."

"How?"

"I shall find a means, never fear. You don't want it yet; such a bulky object could not be hidden very well. I shall contrive to let you have it on the night appointed for the escape."

"And when will that be?"

"It depends partly on yourself. How long would it take you to saw through those bars?"

"Two nights."

"That will give you plenty of time. On the afternoon of the third day from this, then, you shall have the rope."

"I shall be ready."

"When you reach the court-yard," said Captain Hawk, "you must cross it with all speed possible. Just opposite to you you will find a rope hanging down. Seize it and ascend. I shall be on the other side with a couple of good horses, and I hope we shall get some miles away before your escape is discovered."

Dick's heart beat faster.

"The plan is bold, simple, and straightforward."

"And therefore almost certain to succeed."

"I think so."

"Captain Hawk, you are a true friend. Would that our acquaintance had begun earlier, and that we knew each other better!"

"There is plenty of time for that, Dick. Depend upon it, there are merry days in store."

Soon after this, Hawk took his leave.

Dick was in a state of greater excitement, owing to the brilliancy of his hopes, than he had been since his capture.

He had no little difficulty in restraining his emotions within moderate bounds.

But, luckily, he did not meet with many interruptions.

His mind was now exclusively filled with one object; and all the day his eyes were fixed upon the little grated window, while he earnestly prayed for night to come that he might have the chance of making a trial of his saw.

On that day Dick fared sumptuously, for his appetite was good.

He had to pay, as we have said, a most extravagant price for all these luxuries; but Dick Turpin was about the last man in the world to trouble himself upon this score.

His dinner was washed down by a bottle of better wine than one could have fancied procurable within the walls of a prison.

After that, Dick felt in perfect readiness for anything.

Never did he have a more difficult task than the one of simulating patience while he was so anxiously longing for the coming of night.

As if to try him still further, the Governor was half an hour later than usual in making his rounds that night.

This half-hour seemed to [illegible] as long as a day.

When the visit was over, and when the Governor and his subordinates had retired, apparently under the impression that all was secure, Dick sat for a moment or two, and then freed himself from his fetters.

With all speed the table and chair were placed beneath the window.

Then mounting noiselessly, Dick peeped out.

All things below and around him were wrapped in darkness.

Deep silence prevailed.

Finding nothing was to be gained by observation, the prisoner, with a fast-beating heart, produced his saw and set to work with it.

The iron grating was old, but strong, despite the manner in which the rust had corroded.

Compared with the exquisitely-tempered steel saw, the iron bars seemed to be of some soft material.

Dick worked steadily and perseveringly.

Yet after an hour's arduous toil he seemed to have done but little, especially when compared with what remained to be done.

The iron bars would have to be sawn through in at least six places before he could hope to have the aperture large enough to allow of the passage of his body.

As yet he had produced but a slight impression upon one of these bars.

But he was working for his life and liberty; and when two such precious possessions as these are at stake no enterprise is deemed too difficult—no toil too great.

So it was with Dick.

He worked with a will, and when the time came when for safety's sake it was absolutely necessary he should desist, he was so fatigued that he could scarcely move.

With great care he blew away every atom of the iron filings, so that none of these should be seen, and so betray him.

He was, however, well satisfied with his labours, for he had certainly performed one half of his allotted task.

When the turnkey entered the cell at the accustomed hour, he failed to perceive anything unusual in the cell, or in the prisoner himself.

Having been not only awake, but at work, during the whole of the night, Dick stood greatly in need of rest, and as soon as he was alone prepared himself to sleep.

In a few moments he was profoundly unconscious of everything, and remained so until the removal of the heavy fastenings on the outside of the cell door aroused him.

Starting up suddenly, he was surprised to find that the day was already far advanced.

The opening door disclosed the form of the priest, who had come, as everyone in the castle who knew anything about it fully believed, to administer spiritual consolation to the condemned prisoner.

And in one sense so he had—the consolation of spirit, of which Dick considered himself most in need.

The very first glance at the captain's face assured the prisoner that all continued to go well.

There was no difficulty about communicating with each other, for the turnkey left them to themselves, as is usual in such cases.

"All goes on as you could wish?" were Dick's first words.

"Yes, most favourably. And you?"

"I worked during the whole of last night; but the bars are very thick, and will have to be sawn through in many places."

"It is a tedious labour."

"Very."

"But time will enable you to accomplish it."

"The task is half performed."

"Why, then, all is well. Work with equal vigour to-night, and to-morrow get what rest you can. You will have need of all your strength to-morrow night."

"I know it. And the rope?"

"You shall have it."

"But how?"

"I have hit upon the means," said Captain Hawk, with a satisfied smile, "and I think you will give me credit for a little ingenuity."

"I am all impatience to know it."

"Well, then, every day you receive a good dinner, do you not?"

"Certainly; but how——"

"Wait a moment, and you shall hear. When the turnkey comes in to-morrow night, among other things, a fruit pie of some sort. The loaf of bread you will receive as usual."

"Yes—but——"

"Do not interrupt me. The turnkey always brings you twice as much of everything as you want, because all that you leave he has himself."

"Just so."

"Well, then, I have found out the place where he is in the habit of procuring these delicacies for your table, and I have bribed the woman who serves him so heavily that she has consented to do all that I require."

"And that is?"

"To conceal one half of the rope inside the loaf of bread—the other half will be in the pie dish, covered with the crust."

"I see—I see. But will not these things be examined at the gate?"

"No. I have been careful to ascertain that."

"How is that?"

"If anyone sent you anything it would be most rigorously searched; but these things, you understand, come from a regular place of business, where the people could have no interest in befriending prisoners, and are fetched in by a turnkey. This is how it happens that the things escape scrutiny."

CHAPTER MCXXXIV.

CAPTAIN HAWK HAS A NARROW ESCAPE OF DETECTION IN THE VESTIBULE OF THE PRISON.

"I see—I see!" responded Turpin, whose hopes rose higher. "Success is certain."

"I think we may really venture to think so. Of course, when the provisions come, you must observe every caution. It will be your fault if the turnkey has any suspicions."

"It will be my fault, and if it happens I shall be content to abide the consequences of it."

"That is enough, then. I will answer for the rest."

"But," said Dick, and then he hesitated as if in doubt whether to proceed.

"But what? Why do you pause?"

"Because I ought to feel certain I could trust you."

"Of course you can. But what was your thought?"

"I was wondering whether it would be possible to make a loaf and pie-dish hold a sufficient quantity of rope to enable me to escape. The cell window is a long way from the ground."

"I ought to have explained," said the captain, hastily; "and by no means wonder at your question."

"I might have known you would not have overlooked such an important point."

"The fact is, I have had the rope prepared especially. Being made entirely of silk, it is consequently very fine, and yet strong enough to bear ten times your weight. You need be under no apprehensions about a breakage."

"Pardon me—I see now it was simple enough."

"Ordinary rope," pursued the captain, "would have been by far too bulky to be serviceable; but this will be just what you require. At one end is a hook, which will enable you to fasten it readily and securely."

"A thousand thousand thanks! I feel now assured that the escape will be a successful one."

"Of course it will—why doubt it?"

"I do not."

"Then I will leave you. You understand what you have to do, because I intend this to be my last visit to the castle. The Governor tried to intercept me as I was leaving yesterday, and I want to avoid a meeting with him if I can possibly do so."

"Pray be careful," said Dick, with sudden alarm for the safety of his friend.

"I will be careful; make yourself quite easy on that score; I am not likely to forget that I hold your life in my hands."

"But for your own sake!"

"To tell you the truth, when there is no one else concerned beside myself I always laugh at danger—it is best to despise it."

"Still, be cautious—your life hangs upon a thread."

"A strong one, I hope. but let us leave this. I will repeat once more what you have to do: descend by the rope—cross the court-yard—seize the rope you will find thrown over the wall. On reaching the summit you will see me—another moment we shall be off and away as swiftly as the two best horses in York can take us."

Dick pressed his friend's hand warmly, and renewed his thanks.

"So simple a plan," he said, "and depending on so few contingencies, is certain to succeed."

"If you perform your part," responded the captain, "I have little fear of the result."

With these words the pair parted.

The captain pulled his broad-brimmed hat well over his eyes, and gathered his gown around him.

"If that confounded Governor is only out of the way," he muttered, as he followed the turnkey along the corridor, "all will be well."

The outer vestibule was quickly reached.

The captain drew a long breath when he saw the Governor was not present.

Ten strides took him to the outer door.

The man on duty thrust his key into the lock and was in the act of turning it when Hawk's quick ear caught the sound of a footstep, and some one behind him said:

"Ahem!"

The turnkey stopped unlocking the gate and turned round, for he at once recognised the voice.

"Reverend sir," said the Governor, hastening forward, "a word or two, if you please, before you go."

The captain was now, to use his own expression, "in for it."

The much-dreaded ordeal could not be avoided.

Now that this interview was inevitable the captain put a bold front on the matter.

Turning round, he bowed low, as though to intimate that he was entirely at the Governor's service.

"Ahem!" said the latter, again. "Myself and some others are anxious to know how you have succeeded in your interview with the desperate character we have now in custody?"

"I don't think he suspects me," thought Captain Hawk.

Then aloud he said:

"I think, sir, that I have no great reason to complain Conscientiously, I may say that I have used my best endeavours, and have every hope that I shall succeed."

"Ah! that is very satisfactory. But as there is an uneasy feeling abroad respecting the prisoner, excuse me for suggesting that it would be still more satisfactory if he made a confession."

"He has confessed," said the captain.

"Confessed?"

"Yes, this morning."

"And has he signed it?" asked the Governor, eagerly.

"Not yet. But he has told me all from first to last. At his request, I am now about to commit the facts to writing in as brief a manner as I can. On my next visit he will sign the document, and after his execution he desires that it may be made public."

"And does he seem reconciled to his fate?"

"Through my exhortations, I think—humbly, of course—that I may say yes."

"That is very gratifying. I confess this was my own opinion. But there have been others professing to know the man who have stated that this apparent resignation of his is ten times more to be dreaded than any manifestations of violence."

The captain could not repress a smile.

The Governor noticed it, and said:

"You smile, reverend sir."

"It was at the thought of how much they were mistaken."

"Believe me, it is no slight relief to me to hear you say so. Until a moment or so ago, I had serious thoughts of renewing the outside guard round the prison, which some have said ought never to have been discontinued."

The captain, at hearing this, felt the perspiration start out at every pore.

"What is your opinion, reverend sir?" added the Governor.

"I do not like to take the responsibility of uttering it," answered the captain, with a hesitation and embarrassment which the Governor was far from attributing to its real cause; "but if I may speak from the apparent state of the prisoner's mind, I must say that I think there can be no need of it. He is, I believe, quite resigned to his fate. I must take my leave now," he added, "for I have much on my hands."

"And you will be here to-morrow?"

"Yes, to-morrow, if possible; at any rate, on the next day."

Captain Hawk thought of those words afterwards, for when he uttered them nothing was further from his intention.

The Governor bowed, and retired.

The next moment Captain Hawk, to his intense satisfaction, was outside the prison.

Not until then did he venture to breathe freely.

"Confound him!" he ejaculated. "Renew the outside guard! That would be destruction to my plan. I am glad I know of this, for I should think twice now before I trusted myself inside those strong stone walls. Perhaps what I have said will be sufficient to prevent him from carrying out his intention. At any rate, I can only hope so."

In truth, it was no slight thing that Captain Hawk should thus have undergone the ordeal of a few minutes' interview with the Governor of York Castle.

He was not prepared to submit the excellence of his disguise to so severe a trial.

In the meanwhile, Dick, profoundly ignorant of the narrow escape of discovery his friend had just had, did nothing but felicitate himself upon the tempting prospect he had before him.

The means devised by Captain Hawk were so simple that the more the details were dwelt upon the greater seemed to be the probability of ultimate complete success.

His hopes continued to rise, and it may certainly be said that never was there enterprise about which he felt so sanguine.

Nothing of particular moment occurred to break the ordinary routine of life in his cell until after the Governor had paid his usual nocturnal visit.

When that was over, Dick renewed his work upon the iron bars.

He laboured with even greater energy than on the preceding night.

He did not stop to rest until he had cut deeply into every one of the bars in such a manner that they could be completely severed in an hour at the utmost.

The night was a rough and boisterous one—just such as he would have chosen for his projected escape, for while the wind was roaring so about the massive pile it was next to an impossibility for any slight unusual sound to attract notice.

On this occasion Dick had been careful not to lose the small iron filings, but had collected them carefully and mixed them with a small quantity of black dirt, of which there was a plentiful supply upon the floor and walls of the cell.

The whole he then moistened with some of the wine which had by accident been spilt upon the table.

Having worked the whole up into a soft mass, he applied it to those places where he had used his saw, and so concealed what he had done.

Of course, had anyone gone close to the grating, a single glance would have shown what had been done.

But it was not possible to detect that aught was amiss while standing on the floor of the cell, and this was enough, for Dick had not to dread any closer examination.

It was probably Dick's fancy which made him think that the turnkey looked more closely and suspiciously around the cell than usual.

But he saw nothing.

The active exertions he had made caused Dick to eat with a good appetite.

Doubtless this, being intended for his last day, would have seemed at least double the length of any other; but Dick was so completely fatigued that he fell into a deep sleep, and passed several hours of it in unconsciousness.

But his sleep was vexed with terrible visions, and when he awoke it was with a sudden start.

The perspiration stood out upon his brow in large drops.

He glanced round him wildly for a moment, and then seemed actually to derive consolation from the fact that he was safe in his cell.

"How horrible!" he murmured, in a hollow voice. "It was only a dream; but if I had another such a one I should dread to close my eyes again."

He shuddered from head to foot, and some time elapsed before he could shake off the effects of the terrible vision with which he had been visited.

The remembrance of what he had to do in a short time assisted him greatly in recovering his composure.

It was truly comforting to think that within all probability not more than four or five hours had to elapse before he should again be in possession of that most precious of all things—his liberty.

In the morning, at breakfast, he had, according to his usual custom, ordered his dinner, and was careful to carry out Captain Hawk's injunction.

At the usual hour the turnkey entered.

"A feast for a prince!" he said, as he placed the articles one by one upon the table. "I admire you, captain—I do indeed. I never knew anyone in this prison, all the years I have been in it, make themselves so comfortable and contented as you have. You look a hundred per cent better than you did when you came."

"I am, thanks to your attention," said Dick, with a smile.

"Well, perhaps so. All I can say is, if you manage to get through all you have on the table before you you won't hurt."

This was no doubt right.

There seemed to be enough for half a dozen men.

"I will try to do justice to it," said Dick.

"Do, captain. Take your time. If you want anything else you have only to call out. I shall be just on the other side of the door, that's all."

Dick was full of impatience for this man to be gone, yet he dared not manifest the least sign of this feeling.

Most difficult, however, was it for him to keep this control over himself.

On the table before him he saw the loaf and the pie-dish as well.

The moment the turnkey left him he seized the first-named article, being full of anxiety to satisfy himself that it really contained the rope.

Pulling the loaf apart, he found in the centre of it a quantity of silk cord.

There seemed to be very little, however, though he found it was rolled up tightly into the smallest possible compass.

It was very fine—almost too fine to enable anyone to grasp it firmly.

Dick hid this in a moment.

He did not doubt now that the remainder was in the pie-dish, so he prepared to eat his dinner.

He found himself able to do but scant justice to it, his thoughts being all the time fixed upon the pie.

His impatience increased to such an extent that he found it beyond his control.

He cut the pie with a trembling hand.

He was not disappointed.

The silk cord was there.

Pulling it out, he secreted it hastily, and finished his meal.

When the things were removed by the turnkey, Dick was in an agony of suspense for the Governor to pay his customary visit.

Yet much as he longed for, he justly dreaded this ordeal.

At the least symptom of anything suspicious, a search might be made, which would inevitably bring to light the much-prized cord, and so cut off all hopes of his escape.

Under the circumstances, Dick did the very best thing possible.

This was to place himself at full length upon the bench, with the cord beneath him, and to cover himself over with the rug, as though he had retired to rest for the night.

When the Governor entered, he affected to have been just aroused from a light sleep.

Nothing could have looked more unsuspicious.

The Governor glanced round him with a satisfied air; and, fully impressed with the conviction that the prisoner was perfectly safe, he left the cell.

"Ha," he said to the turnkey, as he strode along the corridor, "what a thing it is to maintain perfect discipline inside a prison! I never could account for escapes in any other way than concluding that the Governors have been remiss in their duty. I never had an escape in my time, and never shall while I continue to make my regular nightly round."

From this it will be seen that the Governor returned to his quarters on this occasion as comfortable a state of mind as can be imagined, little thinking how truly useless were those visits of inspection upon the importance of which he so prided himself.

When Dick realised that he was really left alone for the night, his emotions were so great that he was completely overpowered.

At last he managed to draw forth his skeleton keys, but his hands shook so, and his heart beat at such a rapid rate, that he could make no use of them.

That he should suffer no ordinary amount of excitement on such an occasion can readily enough be imagined.

At last, however, he managed to calm himself.

The fetters were unfastened and laid upon the floor.

"In the morning," he said, "when they see them here, they will wonder by what mysterious agency I managed to slip out of them."

And to make this wonder the greater he re-locked them all again.

Then, mounting to the window, he commenced his work.

The night was by no means such as he could wish.

A slight breeze was blowing, which drove several detached masses of clouds across the heavens.

When the clouds covered the moon the obscurity was deep enough for his purpose; but the darkness did not last long, and when the cloud passed over it made the moonlight appear, by contrast, to be twice as bright as it really was.

But the attempt must be made.

With hearty goodwill did Dick work; and yet, for all that, rather more than an hour elapsed before he finished his work of sawing through the iron bars.

The top bar he did not saw quite through, but sufficiently to enable him to bend it in such a manner as to leave plenty of room for him to slip out.

CHAPTER MCXXXV.

THE RESULT OF DICK TURPIN'S ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE FROM YORK CASTLE.

HAVING reached this stage in his progress to freedom, Dick Turpin for the first time paused to rest.

Now that the grating was positively removed, it did indeed seem to him that the most serious obstacle intervening between himself and liberty was no longer in existence.

So great was his impatience that it had even hurried him on to doing it before he examined the cord which had been so cleverly delivered to him.

Nor did he seem in any hurry to do so.

Leaning his arms upon the edge of the opening in the wall—for window we cannot call it—he looked out upon the scene before him.

The rapidity with which he had worked had greatly exhausted him, and now, with sensations of the keenest delight, he felt the cool night air fan his temples.

He looked down at the boundary wall he had to cross.

When the moon's disc happened to be free from clouds he could see this plainly enough.

Then he looked for some signs of Captain Hawk with the horses he had promised.

A keen pang shot through his heart when he found he was not to be seen.

A moment's reflection, however, told him how foolish it was on his part to expect to see anything of the kind.

Captain Hawk would take the utmost pains to keep himself invisible.

Had he been seen by Dick he must have also been exposed to the view of anyone else who might happen to look out in that direction.

This was a danger he would never incur, as he would know if seen suspicion would be immediately excited.

"He is there all right," said Dick, after a pause. "I will not wrong him by doubting him for a single moment; beyond all question he will be as good as his word."

Being now considerably rested, Dick stepped down to examine his cord.

The opportunity was a favourable one, for the moon was shining into his cell with so much brightness that he had no difficulty at all in seeing what he was about.

When the cord was all unwound, and the two pieces joined together, he computed the total length to be between sixty and seventy feet.

This, he was quite sure, was more than long enough to reach from the highest point of the castle to the ground, so that all uneasiness on this head was at an end.

He tried it all, and found the strength very great; nor was it so difficult to retain a firm grasp upon it as he at first imagined.

At one end of the cord a strong iron hook was carefully fastened.

Having tested the whole to the best of his ability, and found it perfectly secure, he prepared himself to take a last leave of his cell.

His heart beat faster, and his breath came and went in sudden gasps.

Who could wonder that his excitement should now have risen to its highest pitch?

When he stood once more upon the chair, he trembled so with excess of agitation as to cause the structure below him to shake violently.

His first care was to secure the hook.

This was a matter of no difficulty.

He had left about two inches of the upright bar sticking up from the masonry, and a better place of fastening than this could hardly be conceived.

With shaking fingers he adjusted the hook, and pulled it to make sure that it was firm and that the fragment of the upright iron bar was sufficiently strong to sustain his weight.

All seemed well.

His efforts only served to make the rope more secure.

And yet at this moment he was conscious of feeling a powerful disinclination to trust himself to the rope.

It was one of those strange inward presentiments which we all feel at some time or other, and which are in general too apt to be disregarded.

The feeling grew stronger and stronger, and it required more than an ordinary effort to shake it off.

But Dick did so.

"This is folly," he said—"absolute folly and weakness. I could not have believed I was so childish. What have I to fear? All is well. The rope is strong and securely fixed."

Yet though his lips declared all to be well, his heart whispered all was not well.

"It is the ease with which I have succeeded that has made me so apprehensive. I will take effectual steps to put an end to it without delay."

So saying, he cautiously set himself to work to pass through the aperture, a proceeding that was by no means easy.

He took care to keep fast hold of the rope, and in less than a moment had fairly committed himself to it.

Slowly and carefully he suffered the silken cord to slip through his hands—lower and lower he went.

Half the descent was successfully accomplished—perhaps rather more than half—when, with frightful suddenness, Dick found the rope was no longer supported from above.

Whether the jutting-up piece of iron bar had broken away from the mortar in which it was embedded—

Whether the cord had snapped—

Or whether the iron of which the hook was composed had proved too light and weak to support his weight he knew not.

But his mind was filled with the awful and appalling consciousness that he was falling through the air.

The sensation was a horrible one.

Involuntarily, a dismal shriek thrilled from his lips.

It echoed far and wide in the silent air.

Then instantly came a horrid crashing sound.

It was succeeded by intense silence.

But this silence was of the shortest possible duration.

It might have been that the prison officials had become aware that the prisoner was no longer a tenant of his cell before that awful shriek arose which startled everybody.

Be this how it may, it at all events, is certain that, with the rapidity of lightning, lights appeared at the various windows of the castle walls.

A huge bell sent forth a sonorous clang.

Those booming sounds, striking the night air, would echo far and wide over the peaceful city, and at once apprise the inhabitants of what had occurred.

That bell was never tolled except on the occasion of an escape or a fire.

Dick lay upon the hard flagstones moaning slightly, and apparently being unconscious of where he was.

But where was Captain Hawk?

True to his engagement, he was at the proper spot at the appointed hour.

He was fully alive to the necessity of concealing himself from the observation of any of the officials or inhabitants of the castle, and this is how it happened that Dick could not catch a glimpse of him.

There being no guard now round the interior wall, the captain had no fear of an interruption.

The horse he had hired for Dick Turpin's use he secured by the bridle to Satan's saddle, for he knew his own docile steed would obey him in all things by word of command, and that there was no need to subject him to any sort of restraint.

He held the rope in his hand which he told Dick would be found hanging down on the inner side from the top of the boundary wall.

At one end was secured a small leaden weight, so that he should have no trouble in casting his line over.

Feeling satisfied that all was well, and judging that the hour was close at hand when he might catch a glimpse of his comrade, he held himself prepared for immediate action.

He made his horse, Satan, stand close against the prison wall in such a manner that his side was pressed against the brickwork.

Then, holding the rope coiled up over one arm, the captain mounted; but, instead of sitting, stood up on the saddle.

This was rather a ticklish position to occupy.

Nearly all depended upon the horse, however.

Should the animal move, a fall would be the almost certain result.

But Captain Hawk knew that Satan would stand as immovable as the wall itself.

By reaching up his arms the captain could put his hands upon the spike-protected coping of the boundary wall, and peep over.

He glanced about him rapidly.

He saw, in the first place, that the court-yard was empty.

That was a great satisfaction.

Glancing upwards, he was just in time to see Dick in the act of passing through the window of his cell.

He held his breath, and gazed with the intensest interest.

From where he stood the feat which Dick was attempting seemed, in good truth, a most perilous one.

The slender silk cord was invisible, and, in comparison with the huge mass of building, Dick looked like a fly upon the wall.

Until that awful moment when there ceased to be any support from above all went well, and Captain Hawk began to breathe more freely, and to think that, after all, the descent was not so terrible as it seemed.

Then he beheld his comrade fall, so suddenly that he could scarcely credit the evidence of his own senses.

His first thought was that Dick must have lost his grasp in some way, but the same moment he saw that something had given way above.

The shriek was an awful one which pealed from the prisoner's lips when he felt himself falling headlong down.

Captain Hawk started, and uttered a faint ejaculation of horror.

He forgot the unsteadfast nature of his footing; and as it required considerable nicety of balance to stand upright upon the horse's back at all, it follows that this start caused him to slip and lose his foothold.

He made a desperate effort to save himself, and partially succeeded.

But for all that he fell heavily and awkwardly under the horse's feet, where he lay for a few moments half stunned and wholly unable to move.

At first he could hardly satisfy himself whether or not all that had just happened was a freak of his own fancy.

To satisfy himself, he struggled to his feet.

He was badly bruised by his fall, and the attempt cost him great pain.

Still more painful, however, was it to remount his steed.

Satan had never stirred.

Once more he peeped over the wall.

At a little distance from him, he could see Dick on the stones.

He was groaning faintly.

"I may be in time to save him yet, for he is not dead," was the thought that flashed like lightning across the highwayman's brain.

In a second he had thrown the weighted rope over the wall.

Having done so, there was no difficulty in securing it to the stout iron spikes.

By the time this was done, however, a door opened, out of which poured a large and well-armed body of men, many of whom carried such lights as in their haste and confusion they had had time to procure.

"Lost—lost!" ejaculated Captain Hawk. "I am too late!"

He was right.

The men, headed by the Governor, had formed themselves into a dense throng round the prostrate form.

To have attempted a rescue would have been an act of such utter madness that even the captain shrunk from it.

To have saved Dick would have been impossible, while he would have been quite certain to bring about his own capture.

The loud tolling of the bell still continued; and though so short a time had elapsed since the alarm was given, yet there were manifest signs that it had widely spread, for people came rushing towards the castle from every direction.

This boded danger to Captain Hawk, but he disregarded it, and continued gazing down into the court-yar like one fascinated.

Many were the ejaculations of wonder which fell from the lips of the assembled crowd when they saw Dick in the court-yard.

But the Governor, after one glance, guessed just what had occurred.

"Raise him quickly and gently, and carry him inside. Thank Heaven it is no worse!"

Apparently, the attempt to raise the fearfully-bruised form was productive of the acutest pain.

His groans increased until they became screams.

"I can't stand this," cried Captain Hawk, "not if I die for him!"

As he spoke he made a desperate effort to raise himself to the top of the wall.

In an ordinary way there is little doubt he would have succeeded in his endeavour.

But now, having so recently been hurt, he felt his limbs so stiff and sore as to make the attempt an abortive one.

Before he could renew it the whole party had passed through the doorway and disappeared.

He heard the ponderous door slammed to, and afterwards the clangour of the bars and bolts.

Dick was beyond his aid now.

With a heavy heart the captain placed himself in the saddle and rode slowly away.

"I would rather have given up my life," he murmured, with deep earnestness, "than such a calamity as this should have happened. What can I do now? What can be more unfortunate? My next step, I suppose, will be to resume my old disguise, and ascertain the extent of his injuries. There may be a chance that a second attempt may succeed; but I fear it—I sadly fear it."

Captain Hawk carried out the intention he had expressed.

Despite his own great personal danger in doing so, he presented himself at the earliest allowed moment on the following morning at the wicket of the prison.

Had he not known so well what had occurred, a glance would have told him that something very unusual had occurred to disturb the monotony of the prison.

"Your services will be needed, I think, holy father," said the turnkey, unsuspiciously. "The prisoner made a desperate attempt to escape last night; but failed, and he now lies more dead than alive on a bed where he is closely watched. Not that he is to be feared now, however—he cannot raise his hand."

THE EXECUTION OF DICK TURPIN AT YORK CASTLE.

Captain Hawk was much distressed to hear this account of his companion, and hoped that he should find things not quite so bad as they had been represented to him.

Merely thanking the man for his intelligence, but taking care to express his astonishment at what he had heard, the captain passed on.

He was at once allowed to see the prisoner,

He found two of the turnkeys in the cell.

The different things the captain had given Dick had been found, and the pair were speculating as to the means by which the prisoner had obtained them.

When the captain bent down over the bed, Dick's face lighted up with a smile of recognition.

Hawk made a hasty and almost imperceptible sign for him to be cautious.

"You little expected to find me thus; but all is over now: I feel that I must resign myself to my fate."

"Are you much hurt?" asked the seeming priest, in a voice of the deepest grief.

"No bones broke, the doctor says," Dick answered, feebly. "He has caused me a thousand tortures by his examination. Would—oh, would that I had fallen a little further!"

He was compelled to pause and utter a groan.

The two turnkeys, having no suspicion that the priest was other than he seemed to be, without being requested to do so, withdrew to such a distance as to be out of earshot, though they could still watch the movements of their prisoner.

Seeing this, Dick whispered, in a low tone:

"Captain, I feel that I have not long to live. Do not shake your head, or attempt to convince me that I am mistaken; I cannot misunderstand my feelings now. I almost succeeded, but my fate is that I shall remain here. I know the worst, and so shall not shrink, but nerve myself as best I may to meet my doom. Were the prison doors thrown open to me at this moment, I am conscious that it would be of no advantage to me. I have an inward feeling which tells me that the injuries I have received are mortal ones. Besides, I could read that the surgeon's opinion was that there were no hopes of my recovery. What I long for is that I may be allowed to yield up my life in this place, and not upon the gallows."

Pain again compelled him to pause.

Captain Hawk was so much overcome by his emotions that he found himself unable reply.

He tried to gulp down the painful swelling that seemed suddenly to rise up in his throat and prevent all further utterance, but the endeavour was a vain one.

CHAPTER MCXXXVI.

THE PARTING OF DICK TURPIN AND CAPTAIN HAWK.—THE EXECUTION.—CONCLUSION.

Dick Turpin fixed his lustreless eyes upon the captain's face, and went on:

"I do not fear death," he said. "Life has long had but little charms for me, now it has none at all. But I dread the scaffold—the gaping, gibing crowd, and the hateful hangman's loathsome touch—my sole surviving hope is that I may escape this."

He paused again.

"Never despair," said Captain Hawk, with an ineffectual attempt to appear hopeful himself. "I——"

Dick shook his head.

"I know," he continued—"I can understand how I feel; the consciousness is strong upon me that I have not many hours to live. After such injuries as I have received it is a wonder that I live at all—quite out of the question that I can recover. I feel, too, that this will be our last meeting, and so I wish you to listen to the few words I have to say."

"Speak—speak," said the captain, chokingly, for he could plainly see that his companion was not much longer for this world—"let me know all your wishes."

"There are but few—very few."

"They shall be as commands to me. Have no fears that they will not be carried out."

"After my death, then—do not interrupt me, because I know my death in one shape or other is certain to take place—I say, when all is over, endeavour to save my body from desecration by the surgeon. If you can get anyone to claim me my body will be given up. Let it be interred in some quiet nook in a churchyard, where the grass will grow and the trees wave over me. That is all. Indulge my wish, but let us not waste precious time by dwelling upon this part of the subject. You give me your promise, do you not?"

"I do, most faithfully."

"Enough; and now for one more request. Should you ever visit London——"

"I will go at any moment to serve you."

"Nay, there is no emergency in the case. But when you are there again I want you to seek out one Matthew Gale. He is the landlord of a public-house in Drury Lane—the sign is the White Horse. It stands at the corner of White Horse Yard."

"I will not forget it."

"I want you to see him and make him acquainted with all the events that have taken place. Tell him my last thoughts were about him, and that there was hardly anything that caused me so much regret as my inability to see him."

"You may depend that this will be done."

"Thanks. When you see him you will see a true friend. At any risk or hazard to himself he will protect you from the officers. I owe him more than I can possibly express."

"And is there nothing more that I can do for you?" said the captain, sadly. "Think again, Dick—think again."

"Nothing," answered Dick Turpin, after a long pause. "I have said all."

"Then," murmured Captain Hawk, earnestly, "should the worst happen, you need suffer no anxiety on the score of what you have said to me. But, believe me, I have not yet lost all hope of saving you."

"There is only one way of saving me," answered Dick, "and that is, by giving me something which I can take, and so make sure of dying peacefully here before the arrival of the time appointed for my execution."

"Poison!" exclaimed Captain Hawk.

"Yes."

"Dick," he said, "I have called myself your friend, but I have done little yet in the way of friendship."

Turpin raised his hand deprecatingly.

"I have tried," continued the captain, "but no success has attended my endeavours. Still, I have sworn to aid you, and if I can do it in no other way than that which you have just named I will not shrink."

"Thanks—thanks!" was the faint answer. "That would be rendering me a service indeed."

"But I still hope to serve you better."

Dick Turpin, however, would not permit himself to derive any consolation from this.

"Farewell, captain!" he said, at length. "My strength is giving out so fast that I shall not be able to speak much longer. I repeat my wish that I had known you earlier, vain though that wish be. Bid me farewell, for we may not meet again."

There was more despondency about Dick when he pronounced these words than he had yet displayed.

"I will not say farewell," said Captain Hawk, speaking with a great effort. "But I——"

"Yes—yes," interrupted Dick—"indulge me!"

"Farewell, then!"

The parting words were spoken, and an opportunity was seized when the turnkeys did not happen to be looking that way to exchange a warm pressure of the hand.

Dick clasped the captain's convulsively.

But the muscles relaxed, and the famous highwayman, worn out by what had taken place, sunk back in a state of partial unconsciousness.

The captain seized upon this opportunity to withdraw.

He gave one lingering glance, for he seemed in the depths of his heart to be conscious that this was their last meeting.

He made his way somewhat precipitately to the vestibule.

He was dreading an interruption, for he knew that his feelings were anything but under his control, and if the Governor accosted him there would be great danger of discovery.

On gaining the vestibule he crossed over to the door with a swift stride.

It was opened, and he was in the act of crossing the threshold when he heard a voice say:

"Stop him!—stop that priest! Don't let him go yet!"

The tones in which these words were spoken carried to the captain the assurance that he was discovered.

It flashed into his mind instantly that he was suspected of having conveyed the tools to the prisoner—indeed, how else could his possession of them be accounted for?

The captain knew he could never stand the test of an examination, so upon hearing these alarming words behind him he, so far from pausing, gave a sudden bound forward.

It was well that he was so speedy in his movements, for the man on the lock hastened to obey the order which had been issued.

Darting forward, he managed to get a good grasp upon the captain's long cloak.

But Hawk unclasped it in a moment, and fled with the utmost precipitation.

Fortunately, the corner of a street was close at hand, and he vanished round it in a moment.

The alarm inside the prison was immediate; but by the time a small party started in pursuit not a trace of the seeming priest could be anywhere discovered.

* * * * *

In York but one subject was discussed—the extraordinary and daring attempt to escape that Dick Turpin had made.

By common consent the priest was set down as an accomplice in the plot.

But the point upon which there was the greatest amount of discussion was whether the execution would take place on the day appointed, which was the one succeeding that upon which Captain Hawk had paid his farewell visit.

The majority declared that the execution must be deferred on account of the serious injuries the prisoner had received from his awful fall—it was generally reported that he had not a single bone left that was unbroken.

Others, to use their own phrase, loudly declared that the "gallows would be cheated of its due."

Others, again, were strongly inclined to think that the authorities would make strenuous efforts to carry out the sentence of the law, even if the unhappy victim should be carried half dead to the fatal tree.

But those who thought this were in the minority, though their opinion was fortified by the circumstance that the preparations for an execution went on just as though nothing of an unusual character had taken place.

The greatest uncertainty upon the point prevailed in the old city until a very late hour at night, and then the rumour went that the prisoner had so far recovered that there would be no need for postponing the time originally fixed upon for the carrying out of his sentence.

Among the rest, Captain Hawk—who had managed to gain the shelter of the Old Chequers Inn—heard this rumour, but he resolutely refused to give it credence.

Having seen Dick such a short time before, he felt confident that he could not be taken to the place of execution so soon, and he treated the report as he would have done any other impossible rumour.

But on the following morning the rumour gained strength.

Captain Hawk sent the ostler out to make inquiries.

On his return, the captain was amazed to learn that the preparations were going on more actively than ever, and that everyone declared the sentence would be carried into effect that very day at noon.

Utterly disregarding his own danger, the captain started off.

His first discovery was that a troop of soldiers had arrived, and formed themselves in a circle round the scaffold and in a double line to the door of the prison.

To gain admittance was impossible.

"Alas—alas!" he cried. "Balked again! I cannot even render you the poor service of saving you from the gallows tree!"

Yet, in spite of all he saw, the captain clung to the idea that Dick was too greatly injured to be moved—he could not believe but that the authorities would wait until he had recovered before they proceeded to his immolation.

He did not know that the surgeon, acting under the advice and suggestions of those above him, had administered to the helpless prisoner copious draughts of a medicine which, but for one quality, would have been an invaluable preparation.

This compound caused an inconceivable amount of vigour to infuse itself into the hapless prisoner's aching limbs—he seemed to grow comparatively strong in the course of a few hours.

But the effects of this medicine were only transitory, and the worst was, that with the cessation of them came such a frightful exhaustion that it was next to an impossibility for the patient to rally.

But this was considered to be of no consequence in the present case—all that the authorities desired was that the prisoner should live long enough to be made an example of.

The potent drug produced a species of stupefaction upon Dick not unlike that which he experienced after drinking the brandy given him by the ostler—the feeling was not quite so strong and yet he was partially unconscious.

His mental powers were so much in abeyance that he offered no resistance to the will of his captors—he rose and moved mechanically anywhere that they might choose to direct him

His limbs felt numbed and strange, but he was released from all that pain which only on the preceding day had been so excruciating.

Nevertheless, in a dim, vague way he was aware that he was about to be led forth to die; but even this knowledge did not serve to make him resist.

By the aid of the turnkeys, he was enabled to walk on that fatal morning to the outer door of the prison.

Here the usual kind of procession was made, Dick still being more like an automaton than a living being.

Not until this door was opened and the closely-guarded prisoner appeared did Captain Hawk believe that the execution was really about to take place.

The discovery of his error came upon him like a thunder-clap.

Before he had recovered himself, the prisoner, still aided by supporters, had traversed the short space intervening between the prison door and the scaffold.

It would be too painful to linger over the last moments of the hero whose career we have followed for so long with such deep interest.

Captain Hawk was powerless.

Had he been equal to a hundred men, or, indeed, had he had a thousand at his command, the result would have been the same. The authorities were armed at all points against a rescue.

All know how Dick Turpin met his fate. On reaching the ladder, he summoned up all the strength which he possessed, and ascended unaided. His limbs were not properly under his command—one leg trembled as if with the palsy. Anxious that the cause should not be misconstrued, he stamped down his foot with angry violence, and, by a last exercise of his indomitable will, regained the command over his shaking limb.

The executioner was busy with his rope.

He had run up the ladder first, and now he slipped the noose over the victim's head.

It was just at this very moment that all the sea of faces and the other varied objects around faded from before Dick's eyes, yet there was no quailing in that last glance.

He knew, though, that consciousness was going.

"Are you ready?" he said, in a hollow voice.

These were his last words.

"Yes," said the hangman, descending a step preparatory to "turning the prisoner off," as the phrase then went.

The operation generally consisted in pushing the shuddering wretch off the ladder, and leaving him to dangle at the gibbet's beam until life became extinct by that most painful and cruel of all deaths, strangulation.

But the office was not performed for Dick.

No sooner had the hangman spoke the word than, with a sudden bound, he threw himself off the ladder.

There was a sharp and sudden jerk, a convulsive plunge, and then all was over. He who may justly lay claim to being the Prince of Highwaymen had in a moment ceased to be. All that remained of him was an inanimate mass of clay.

And so, bold and defiant to the last, the gallant highwayman met his fate.

* * * * *

Slowly the crowd dispersed.

At the appointed time the body was cut down and carried into the prison, preparatory to being handed over to the doctors for dissection. There were many practitioners anxious to secure so interesting a subject.

That is, provided no one came to claim the body, and this was scarcely expected.

Contrary to anticipation, however, the body was claimed and carried away.

On the following day the body was interred in one of the most picturesque churchyards in the outskirts that the City of York could boast.

Thousands followed the mourners; and when the grave at last was reached not a square inch of the churchyard was unoccupied.

Yet the day was one that was calculated to keep all those people indoors who were not brought abroad by necessity.

The cold was piercing, and the keen north wind brought with it clouds of frozen ice and snow.

The clergyman hastened to conclude the ceremony, and when the grave was filled up the crowd began rapidly to disperse.

Heedless alike, however, of the bitter inclemency of the weather and of his own personal danger, one individual, attired in black and muffled in a cloak, remained long after the last lingerer had departed.

His face was bent towards the ground, and had upon it an expression of great pain.

"It was Fate," he said; "and who can control that? All is over now! Had I possessed the power, he would, instead of lying here, be safe and well. But no one can blame me because I failed."

After these words, the reader will have no difficulty in recognising the speaker.

It was Captain Hawk.

He stood now only at the opening of one of the strangest and most vicissitudinous careers that ever fell to the lot of man.

But those vicissitudes and the strange events which happened on the night after Dick Turpin's burial cannot be chronicled here.

They will be found in the Second Series of Black Bess, which the writer confidently asserts will not be found inferior in the point of interest to the first.